The Rev. John Snyder who represents the opposite view, says: "There is no evidence to show that the book is the work of Solomon. It was most probably written by a Northern poet, who had no great regard for Solomon; of course 'the great king' mentioned in it is Solomon. The North was always restless under Solomon's reign, and if it had not been for his great executive ability, rebellion would have broken out before his death. The people there had no fancy for paying taxes for a capital which they never saw, and when he died and his son came to the throne they said: 'We'll have no more of this sort of thing,' and as he would not make them the concessions they asked, they seceded. All this talk about mystical or allegorical interpretation is nonsense. It is as though you were to say of 'Hamlet,' or any other work, that the author did not intend to describe actualities, but to set forth certain philosophical or other principles under the guise of a play, poem, or other writing."

Spiritual Worship.

New Haven Palladium: Not long ago we went to a certain church to seek the spiritual consolation to be obtained from the devout worship and praise of God, especially hoping to be lifted up to a higher life by the singing of some grand, old, simple hymn. We had been in the richly upholstered pew and staring at the painted windows but a few moments when the organ suddenly hushed, and in a distant corner of the church, four fashionably dressed ladies and gentlemen arose and sang. And this is what they sang:

God is a spirit: God is a spirit; and they that worship him, and they that worship him, and they that worship him must worship him in spirit and in truth. God is a spirit, and they that worship him: God is a spirit must worship him; they must; must worship; worship Him; in spirit and in truth; for the Father seeketh such; (tenor) for the (all loud) seeketh such, seeketh such, seeketh such to worship him. (Very softly) God is a spirit; (waxing louder) God is a spirit and they; they that worship him; they; and they; they that worship him, must worship him; must worship him; and (loud yellando) they that worship him; and they: must: that worship him (tenor, softly) (contralto) worship: (all) him in spirit and in [illegible] (all but tenor). for (all) the father seeketh [illegible] (bass) seeketh such (all softly) to worship him [illegible] worship: (sort o' dying away) in spirit and [illegible] tru-u-u-th!

As the concluding cadences softly died away among the vacant pews, like the still small voice among the cliffs of Sinai, we could not help wondering whether those much-tortured words had any meaning, and, if so, whether that meaning had any application to the performance just ended. What is "worship in spirit and in truth?"

Peter Cooper and the Bishop.

A correspondent says that in a talk with Peter Cooper a short time ago the venerable philanthropist told him of the following incident: "I have just had a curious caller—an Episcopal bishop, who came to see if I would not join 'some evangelical church,' so that when I came to die nobody should say that the Cooper union was established by an atheist or infidel. I told him I was not an atheist or infidel; I was a Unitarian in belief; I know no object of worship except the one living and true God; and I considered religion nothing more nor less than a science by which the movements of the material and moral world could be regulated, and that I knew no better teacher than the opinions of mankind. He politely said that he perceived that I was a scholar. This compliment I was obliged to decline, and I told him I had never been to school more than three or four months in all my life. If I had my way, I told him, the worst of the human race, the most depraved wretches, should wake up in another life, not in torment, but in the midst of loving friends and beautiful things. The good bishop did not even try to convert me to any better theology, but he went away with every expression of kindness—kindness which I am sure he felt."

An English clergyman preached a sermon lately from the text, "God forbid that I should glory save in the cross of our Lord Jesus Christ," and defended the use of the crucifix as an aid to devotion. The bishop of the diocese chanced to be present, and before the audience was dismissed rose and made a public and earnest protest against the bold perversion of the text.

The Episcopal Register broaches an ingenious theory to the effect that the growth of scepticism and atheism increases and diminishes with suicide, that part of Europe which produced many of the most scientific minds, producing also the greatest number of self-imposed deaths. It says that a large proportion of the suicides in this country are Germans, and that the same is true of other countries where Germans have emigrated.

England's Latest Grab.

The latest grab of Great Britain, in the guise of annexation, is the island of Papua, or New Guinea. A commissioner has been sent to that island from Australia to take possession of it as a dependency of Queensland. By this action of the colonial authorities one of the largest islands in the world, with an area of something less than 300,000 square miles, will be incorporated with the British possessions. Papua, or New Guinea—the largest island in the world, with the exception of Australia, and possibly Borneo—is included in the Australasian division of Oceanica, and lies directly east of the Indian Archipelago and north of Australia, from which it is separated by the Torres straits. It is about 1,500 miles long, and its maximum breadth is 400 miles. Its estimated area is from 200,000 to 300,000 square miles. The island is less known to civilized man than any other region of equal extent in the world, for no European had been able until recently to advance more than a few miles into the interior. It is irregular in outline and is deeply indented by several large bays. It is mountainous, is subject to a hot, damp climate, and is clothed with a luxuriantly rich forest vegetation throughout its known extent. The flora resembles that of Borneo. Of the natural history of the island little is known, except what relates to its fauna. Of seventeen Papuan mammals, all are marsupials except three, of which two are bats and one a species of pig. The birds are said to be more numerous and more beautiful than those of any other island. Among those are eleven species of birds of paradise, of which eight are found nowhere else. There are known to be sixty-three different forms of reptiles and batrachians on the island, and the number of beautiful insects is large. No correct estimate of the number of inhabitants can be made. They belong to the typical Papuan race and have a facial expression not unlike that of Europeans. The fertile valleys of the southwestern part of the island are well cultivated by the natives, who excel there as agriculturists. The villages there are singularly neat, in strong contrast with those to the northwest, which are built on poles. Papua was discovered early in the sixteenth century by the Portuguese, and since 1828 the Dutch have had trading stations at various points. The area which has been under Dutch control comprised about 29,000 square miles, with a population of about 200,000, but the Netherlands have claimed nearly half the island. Dorey, a small village in the northern part of the island, is one of the principal Dutch stations visited by European and Mohammedan traders, chiefly for birds of paradise, tripang, wild nutmegs and tortoise shell. Near by are missionary posts.

Saturday evening George W. Conkling took his departure from New York for his home in Reno, Nev., taking his sister, Mrs. Uhler, with him. He had intended to leave sooner, but had been delayed from day to day by his sister's frantic devotion to the spot in the flats where Haverstick was shot. At last, on Saturday afternoon, to her brother's great relief, Mrs. Uhler declared that she would be ready to start that evening. Every preparation was made, and as the hour of departure drew near, she wept violently, calling repeatedly upon the name of her dead lover and declaring that she would not leave for the West before seeing her children. Mr. Conkling's counsel, Col. Cameron H. King, earnestly urged her to accompany her brother, and she was finally persuaded to enter a close carriage with Mr. Conkling and a gentleman who has been his warm friend throughout his trouble, and the carriage was driven to the Grand Central depot. After getting on board the train Mrs. Uhler became almost hysterical, and cried out that she would not go. At times force became necessary to restrain her from leaving the car.

Despite her determination to do so, Mrs. Uhler was unable to embrace her little children before going away with her brother. But she certainly made a desperate effort to accomplish her desires, for, accompanied by her maid, on the 4th inst., she went to Lebanon, Pa., where her husband and her children are residing with Mr. Uhler's parents. Upon ringing the bell of the Uhler mansion the door was opened by a servant girl who had been in the employ of Mr. and Mrs. Uhler before their separation. The girl at once recognized Mrs. Uhler, and, acting probably upon instructions given to her by her employers, shut the door in Mrs. Uhler's face. The unfortunate woman became almost frantic, and, striding up and down the piazza, she gave vent to her anguish in heartrending shrieks, clamoring to be admitted and threatening to break down the door and the windows if she were not allowed to see her children. No attention was paid to her cries by those within the house, and finally her maid succeeded in calming her. But just before leaving the place Mrs. Uhler descried her little ones driving past with their father. She held out her arms imploringly to them, and cried out for them to stop, but either the father and children did not see or hear her, or pretended that they did not, and they were soon out of sight of the heartbroken mother, probably forever. It was with no little effort that the maid was enabled to get her mistress to leave the spot and come to this city.

Those who have been in intimate association with Mrs. Uhler for the past week are under the impression that the poor woman's mind has been unsettled by the shock she received the night of the tragedy in Twenty-third street, and her suffering and remorse which have followed.

NEWS CONDENSED.

Gossip from Washington.

It is reported that Mr. Merrick intends to give notice to Senator Kellogg's counsel this week to appear in court and plead to the indictment in the star route matter. It is understood that they propose to push the case to an early trial, and will not postpone it or allow it to be continued until fall. Mr. Kellogg, when he left the city, seemed as ready as the government to go right on with the trial, and it is not known that he will ask a continuance. The government counsel say the trial will be very brief, not lasting over a week after the jury is obtained.

Secretary Folger has made a decision favorable to the brewing interest, on the question of classification for important duties of kernals of rice broken into fragments. He holds that grain rice does not fall within the designation of rice cleaned in the present tariff, and is liable to duty only at 20 per cent. ad valorem. This destroys the efforts of rice importers to create a monopoly by increasing the duty on granulated rice from half a cent per pound to 21-2 cents per pound on. the argument that granulated rice is composed largely of unbroken rice, and should pay duty as whole rice.

In response to a communication from Secretary Frelinghuysen, inquiring whether there will be any objections to our troops following the Apaches from Arizona over the border, the Mexican minister has replied that such action cannot be properly taken without the express consent of the Mexican senate. A telegram has been sent to Gen. Crook by the secretary of war, directing him to be careful to observe the convention with Mexico on the subject, and to restrain all troops under his command from crossing the boundary line.

President Arthur has devised a way to relieve Secretary Folger. He has commissioned Judge French and Mr. New to take his place, under certain conditions. When Folger is not able to go to the treasury, French is acting secretary. Folger can escape entirely all of the routine work. It is given out to the treasury that he is going to devote himself to the grave legal questions belonging to the office, but the real truth is that he does no work at all and will not be able to, notwithstanding the reports of his restoration to health.

Dorman B. Eaton says that Mr. Keim's appointment as chief examiner was agreed upon by all members of the commission. He denies that Keim was selected to look after the interests of certain politicians, and that Mr. Kiem's authority is limited by law and the commission will take good care that it is not abused. Yet, for all this, the president is represented as congratulating himself that the selection was not his own.

Rail and River News.

A patent for 77,357 acres of indemnity land has just been forwarded to the St. Paul, Minneapolis & Manitoba railway company. These lands have been the foundation of an extended controversy. They were originally selected in 1873, and approved April 30, 1874, for the benefit of the St. Vincent extension railroad by Nov. 12, 1874. The approval was revoked on the ground that there was a conflict with the rights of the main line of the St. Paul & Pacific railroad then operated by a separate corporation.

A new Pacific railroad enterprise, backed by English capitalists, is reported as having been organized. It is called the United States Central railroad, and is to extend from Denver to San Francisco, about 1,200 miles. The stock will be issued $50,000 per mile, and $40,000 in bonds. Seven railroad charters in different states and Territories have been secured by the promoters of this new scheme, who intend to consolidate all of them.

The Chicago, Milwaukee & St. Paul will soon commence its southern main line, from Mitchell and Letcher to Huron. The company will first build from Mitchell to Letcher, a distance of fourteen miles, and from there into Huron, a distance of forty-five miles. The completion of this extension will tend much to benefit Huron, and probably make it the commercial center of Dakota.

The Chicago, Burlington & Quincy engineers have finished their survey of the proposed line of that company to Madison, Wis. From Madison the engineers went to Janesville. Madison, it is thought, will be the terminus of the road, as the survey was not extended beyond it. The new line will pass through Beloit and Edgerton, and pass one mile east of Stoughton.

The Wisconsin, Iowa & Nebraska railroad is completed from Marshalltown to Hudson, nine miles from Waterloo, Iowa, and regular trains will be put on next week. About 42 miles of the line have been completed in all.

The Canadian Pacific is willing to take 25,000 Irish emigrants on to free lands in the Northwest, and to act as trustee for a loan to them from the government of $2,500,000.

It is expected that the Chicago, Milwaukee & St. Paul railroad will soon be extended from Hammond's Ford to Austin via Rochester.

Summary of General News.

Those whose contributions enabled the public spirited ladies of the St. Paul Coffee House association to start their enterprise have reason to be gratified with the results known elsewhere in the report of the secretary for the five months from November till March: Starting with a subscription fund of $2,055.35, the income from the coffee house swelled the receipts for the five months to $22,455.75; disbursements of $20,732.21, including some expenditures for permanent improvements leave a handsome surplus in the treasury.

A Pretty Early Wheat Estimate.

S. W. Tallmadge of the Milwaukee chamber of commerce, whose grain statistics are accounted the most reliable of any in the west, furnishes the following estimate of the wheat crop of 1883 by states. These figures, Mr. Tallmadge explains, are not arrived at by simple guess work, but are the results of careful investigation. The estimates of winter wheat states are from reports of the condition from the agricultural departments, made since April 1. Estimates of spring wheat states are based on the actual acreage sown and probable yield, with a fair season from now until harvest. Should any disaster befall the spring wheat crop, the results will prove much lower than given in the table below:

Maine	$500,000	Tennessee	$8,000,000

The trial of Timothy Kelly, charged with participating in the Phoenix park murders, was continued Tuesday morning. The judge, in summing up the evidence taken, spoke most strongly against the prisoner's claim to an alibi. The jury, after being out a short time, returned and announced that they were unable to agree on a verdict. The jury was sent back to reconsider the case, but after returning the fourth time, and reporting that they could not agree, they were discharged.

Susan B. Anthony in England.

Mrs. Henry B. Stanton writes from London that Miss Susan B. Anthony arrived in England on March 6 after a particularly pleasant voyage. Miss Anthony left London to spend Easter in Rome, but before doing so she went to see Mr. Irving and Miss Terry in "Much Ado About Nothing." Next morning some one asked her how she enjoyed it. "It was so stupid I could hardly keep my eyes open," was her prompt reply. "Irving mouths the English language so that I could not understand a word he said, and what I did understand was not worth hearing, and he moves about in such a stiff way that one might imagine him just recovering from an attack of rheumatism. The only redeeming points to me were the beautiful scenery and the love-making, which was cooler, more distant and more piquant than usual."

COMMERCIAL.

ST. PAUL.

WHEAT—The market was dull, and all there could be done was to make quotations. There were more offerings than there was buying. Some May was offered. The millers are using stored wheat, but fresh deals were limited. No. 1 hard, $1.11 bid, $1.12 asked; May, $1.14 asked; No. 2 hard, $1.07@1.09; No. 2, $1.00@1.03. Sale: 1 car No. 1 hard, $1.11.

CORN—May deal dull, though steadily held for spot. There were no buyers, except at figures below the market. The grain, apparently, was not wanted. No. 2, 48c bid, 52c asked; May, 51c asked; new mixed, 48c asked.

OATS—The market was firm, though there were no active inquiries; stock moderate. There was some figuring to prepare for May deals, but the demand did not seem to be so active as on Friday and Saturday. Quotations: No. 2 mixed, 40c, 41c asked for spot and May; June 42c asked; year, 32c bid, 33c asked; No. 2 mixed, 39c bid; No. 2 white, 41c bid, 43c asked; No. 3 white, 40c bid.

BARLEY—While there was nothing done on 'change, there was a better feeling and better demand outside. Stocks are shorter here, and the brewers are now showing more demand, especially as receipts are light. Prices generally steady at 65c for No. 2; 55c for extra No. 3, and 45c for No. 3.

MILLSTUFFS—Ground feed, kiln-dried, $20 bid, $21 asked. Bran, sacked, $11 asked; Corn meal, coarse $19; bolted, $22.50@23, bulk; outgoing, $1.25@1.40 per 100 lbs. Linseed meal, $19 car lots; jobbing, $20 per ton. Nothing doing in coarse corn meal. Ground feed in moderate demand. Linseed meal firm.

SEEDS—Clover seed is very scarce and firm; on 'change $8.60 per bu. bid; general range of quotations $8.50@9. Timothy is in light supply, and quotable at $1.55@1.65 incoming. Flax seed is not quotable here. There is none coming in, the high prices in Chicago attracting to that market what little there is that might otherwise come to St. Paul. The St. Paul mill is shut down for want of seed supply, hence nothing is done in the seed. The supply all over the country seems to be light.

MINNEAPOLIS.

FLOUR—Orders still come in slowly and the tone of the market is not much better, prices remaining unchanged. Quotations are as follows: Patents, $6.75@7; straights, $5.75@6.10; clears, $5.25@5.50; low grades, $2.25@3.50.

MILLSTUFFS—Bran and shorts show weakness, though quotations are nominally unchanged. Other millstuffs unchanged and in light demand. Quotations are as follows: Bran, $9.25@9.50 per ton; shorts, $10.25@10.50; mixed feed, $18.50@20.50 per ton on track; $18.75@20.75 f. o. b., according to quality. Coarse corn meal is quoted at 50c@$1 per ton below mixed feed.

WHEAT—The market was stronger, bidders advancing ¼c over Saturday's offerings, with holders confident and not disposed to part with their grain, though some sales of No. 1 hard were made at $1.12. Almost any quantity could have been sold at that figure. Quotations are as follows: No. 1 hard, for spot, $1.12; No. 2 hard, for spot, $1.08; No. 1 hard, seller May, $1.12; No. 1 hard, seller June, $1.15; No. 1 hard, for last half May, $1.14; No. 1 Northern, $1.03½; No. 2 Northern, $1.03½; No. 1 regular, $1.03; No. 2, 98c. Millers' association quotations were: No. 1 hard, $1.11; No. 2 hard, $1.06; No 1 regular, $1.06; No. 2 regular, $1 01; No. 3 regular, 96c.

CORN—General inactivity still prevails, with no trading and nothing to gauge figures by. Quotations are nominally as follows: No. 2, seller May, 50c; seller June, 51c; seller August, 54c; condemned, 45@47c for spot.

OATS—Bids were freely made of 40c for No. 2 for spot, 41c being asked, with holders firm. Quotations: No. 2, for spot, 40c; No. 2, seller May, 40c; white, 51@42c; rejected, 37@39c.

HAY—Choice grades are scarce and in active demand at higher prices, while the market is glutted with poor stuff, for which there is no sale. Sales ranged at $9@11 for choice, with poor to fair lots quotable at $4@7.

MILWAUKEE MARKET.—Flour, in fair supply; demand light. Wheat, steady; No. 2 hard, $1.20; No. 2, $1.10½; April, $1.10⅞; May, $1.11¼; June, $1.13¾; July, $1.15⅝. Barley, dull; extra No. 3, weak, 54½. Provisions, higher; mess pork, $19.35 cash and May; $19.60 June. Lard, prime steam, $11.70 cash and May; $11.85 June. Freights—Wheat to Buffalo, quiet and steady, 3½c. Butter, choice, in good demand; others dull. Cheese, firm. Eggs, steady. Receipts—Flour, 7,917 bbls; wheat, 37,459 bu; barley, 14,584 bu. Shipments—Flour, 5,746 bbls; wheat, 1,700 bu; barley, 9,600 bu.

Loss of household furniture of families living in buildings, about $300. Eight families were turned into the street and are stopping with friends, as it is impossible to rent a house in town. This is the second time the Advocate has been burned out in the last three months, but the proprietors say they will not miss an issue if they can get a tent to put up their presses in.

The damages by the late storm at Zumbro Falls are thus given: E. A. Heradon, store wrecked and loss to stock, estimates his damage at $700; F. Sugg, on buildings, $700; A. Scholar, barn destroyed, $200; Dr. H. N. Rogers, loss on stock, $50; front of store smashed in, loss to Scholar, $75; bridge across Zumbro, $4,300; W. H. Bright, damage to house, $100; J. W. Drinkwater sustains a damage of about $400, in that his fine barn was wrenched and twisted all out of shape. N. Radabaugh's house was also lifted up and set off from the foundation, wrenching the building and making the same almost worthless by reason of the removal.

Anoka is to have a new banking institution, with a capital of $100,000, a majority of which has been subscribed by W. D. Washburn. A new three-story brick building will be erected for the use of the bank by Mr. Washburn.

Norwegians will celebrate Norway's independence day anniversary in Albert Lea, May 11.

A foul murder was committed in the town of Nessel, a few miles west of Rush City, on the 8th of November last. Gustav Nord, a Swede, had more or less trouble with his wife for some time and had made threats that he would get away with her. About the above date she was missed by the neighbors from her home, but Mr. Nord claimed she had left him for parts unknown, which statement was not credited by many. However, nothing was done in the matter until Thursday, when the body of the wife was discovered in the bottom of Rush lake, with a stone attached to a rope around the body.

Ralph J. Wiger, a young man thirty-two of age, committed suicide by cutting his throat recently in a room of the Eureka hotel, in Pipestone. He has been a hard drinker for some time, and has been laboring under an attack of delirium tremens for several days. His parents live at Lake Crystal, this state.

Herman Mike and Ernst Kosel of New Ulm were drowned in the Cottonwood recently, while fishing. Both of them leave a wife and three small children to mourn their loss.

Since the recent accident at a railroad crossing in Fergus Falls when the switch engine on the Manitoba road ran into a wagon and severely injured three ladies, conference have been held between the attorney of the injured parties and the corporation for settlement, but failing in this the necessary papers were served upon the railroad company by the law firms of Brow & Haupt and Tyler & Lewis of Fergus Falls, in four different suits for damages. In the case of Mrs. Wilson Hutchins, and aged lady severely bruised and shocked, an who will probably die from the effects thereof, $10,200 is demanded. Miss Esther Hutchinson, loss of left arm, $20,500. Mrs. Shillston, severely bruised, $2,100, making a total of $33,000. The cases will go to court.

Ralph Wegner of Pipestone in an insane fit recently, leaped from the second story of the Eureka hotel to the ground, striking upon his head and shoulders, but apparently was uninjured, and picked himself up and ran to his room again. Tuesday night he locked himself in his room and cut his throat, being dead when found.

Proposals will be received for the erection of the new building for the blind until May 6 at the office of Hon. R. Mott, Faribault, where plans and specifications can be examined on and after April 30.

State Auditor Braden is holding land sales in the southwestern part of the state. He is not expected to return under two weeks.

Mark Onan attempted to drive across the Northern Pacific track at Moorhead ahead of an engine and lost one of his horses. The engineer, fireman and brakeman were arrested for running their engine faster than the prescribed speed.

A man supposed to be Peter Knutson of Wilkin county was found in the Red river at Moorhead, Saturday.

A St. Cloud special says J. W. Treasdell & Co.'s grocery store was broken into and $110 in cash taken from the safe, which was left unlocked. An attempt was made the same morning to force the doors of Boyd's grocery store, without success. A permanently increased police force has been put on duty. There is no trace of the parties doing the work.

The boot and shoe store of R. J. Leib of Faribault was entered by burglars and $98 and some valuable papers taken from the safe. The whole affair was most artistically managed, showing that the theives were undoubtedly professionals.

M. E. Wilcox, formerly of Marshall, was injured in the cyclone at Beauregard, Miss. He was acting as telegraph operator at the time. He had both arms broken and a wound in the head caused by a falling building.

Seedy Scientists.

The late Peter Merian, the Swiss scientist, was a very hospitable man and gladly entertained at either his town or country house all who called on him. Many of his visitors were rather seedy and threadbare in apparel, and others had curious manners, and so his wife came to the conclusion that all scientific men were a ragged or eccentric set; such for instance, as Leopold van Buch, who was always so odd, Charles Lyell, who was wretchedly absent minded, and others. One day, it is said, in 1846, a young geologist presented himself at the museum, taking notes of all the fossils. Merian, struck by the application and good air of the foreigner, asked him to dine with him; "because," said he. "Madame Merian is always reproaching me for bringing home the most indecorous and rough-looking set of fellows; and I shall be glad to show her one man at least on whom she will look without contempt."

Death of a Pioneer Minister.

Rev. Horace Bushnell—"Blind Father Bushnell," as he was familiarly called—who died of brain fever at the age of eighty-one years in Cincinnati, recently, was one of the pioneer ministers of the Ohio Valley. Born in Connecticut and brought up on a farm at Rome, N. Y., he walked all the way from the latter place to Cincinnati, fifty-three years ago, and soon secured a position as teacher in Lane Seminary, which was just being formed. Not long after, he organized a church in that vicinity, and continued to be its pastor until the day of his death, more than half a century later. He was during all his career an intense radical; an abolitionist, a prohibitionist, and a moral and social reformer of the sternest sort. Sixteen years ago he lost his sight and became a cripple, so that since then he went about his pastoral work blind and on crutches.

FARM AND HOUSE.

Agricultural Notes.

An Iowa Journal, The Traer Clipper, remarks that the farmer in that latitude who "will not take to the cow or steer is selling out," because he must.

Mr. S. W. Delano, St. Clair, Mich., had the pleasure of crediting 50 Plymouth Rock hens with 1,620 eggs in 64 midwinter days.

When you prepare your hills for tomatoes this season mix a little bone-dust or ashes with the manure in the hill, and notice how much the crop will be improved thereby. But do not leave the manure in a heap in the hill, but mix it thoroughly and deeply with the soil by means of the hoe or fork.

A bill has been passed by the province of Ontaria, Canada, for the encouragement of tree planting. It provides that any municipality may pay out of the public funds a bonus not exceeding 25 cents for every tree—ash, basswood, beech, birch, butternut, cedar, cherry, chestnut, elm, hickory, maple, oak, pine sassafras spruce, walnut or whitewood—planted along a highway of farm boundary line or within six feet of such bound.

A writer on the subject of laying hens says, he began with a flock, the average laying of each hen being only 55 to 85 per annum. By selecting for hatching, from year to year, the eggs of those hens that laid the greatest number, he brought them up in process of time to lay from 190 to 210 each. We have well authenticated instances of hens laying 250 eggs in a single year, and even more than this number is guessed at. It is highly profitable, under ordinary circumstances, to keep hens which lay 150 to 200 eggs per annum, but quite the contrary if they produce only 60 to 80. The nonsitters are such as give the former; but the sitters, when a good breed, will generally reach about two-thirds of this number.

Industrial Training for Women.

It is a singular fact that there is not in all the United States an indowed institution for the training of women for professional or industrial labor. It is to be hoped that the time is not far distant when the wealthy ladies of the land, many of whom now give so generously to colleges and institutions for the education of men, will devote some of their means to the establishment and endowment of institutions for the thorough training of women in useful callings.—Home Journal.

Preparation of Kalsomine.

Eight pounds of whiting and one-qaurter of a pound of white glue make the right proportions. Soak the glue over night in cold water, and in the morning heat till it is perfectly dissolved. Mix the whiting with hot water, stir the two thoroughly together, and have the wash the consistence of thick cream. Apply warm with a kalsomining brush, brushing it well in and finishing it as you go on. If warm skim milk is used instead of water, the glue may be omitted. Before the wash is applied, all holes and crevices should be stopped with plaster of Paris mixed with water. Colors to tint the walls may be procured at any paint store. M. W., says; "If zinc white is used instead of the whiting, it will last white for many years. The first expense is more, but the investment pays; Use first a sizing of white glue."

From the New York Tribune.

The old-fashioned kitchen garden, fenced in, surrounded with currant bushes and berry plants often spread far out toward the centre, with a few bunches of peonies and here and there a rose-bush and a clump of hollyhocks, where possibly the plough might be used with a good deal of turning and tugging, but more likely the spade with still harder work, belongs to a by-gone age, and savors more of penance than of profit. Nowadays, with the perfect implements for planting and cultivating, gardening may be made easy. If there is no better spot, one corner of the cornfield may be taken, and all of the seeds be planted in rows, thickly or thinly, according to their habit of growing. Let the rows extend across the field, and if too long make part of them corn or potatoes. The ground need only be well prepared, as for corn, and made fine with the harrow and marked with a corn-marker. For the fine seeds like lettuce, onions, etc., the garden rake may be used to smooth the surface along the rows.

When these seeds come up, scrape the earth and weeds away an each side from the young plants with a light touch of the hoe, and leave the row clean. The plants will then be seen distinctly, although small, and the cultivator will mellow the ground between the rows and destroy the weeds, and its occasional use will do most of the garden work. A little hand weeding may be required in the row, if the ground is weedy, otherwise the gardening may be done with a horse and cultivator. Cucumbers melons, beets and everything may be planted after the marker and be covered with the hoe or the garden rake. One man in a day can plant seeds enough for a bountiful supply for a large family. Vegetables and plants raised in this way will grow faster than in a garden and mature sooner. A row or two may be left for the later planting of radishes and winter cabbage, and meanwhile the cultivator will keep the ground clean and mellow.

When July comes the open spaces between the rows of onions and lettuce, and where vacant spots have been made may be strown with turnip seed and raked over, and so all of the ground will be utilized. The pea-rows, later in the season, and where the early potatoes grew, may also be converted into a turnip patch. A few extra loads of manure—the best rotted—ploughed under where the garden is to go, will make stronger growth; and the quicker most vegetables grow the better the quality. The first of June the radishes may be put in and they will be crisp and tender. A little wood ashes and hen manure, mixed together and worked into the soil, will give vegetables a rapid start. Hen manure and plaster is also a superior fertilizer, but not quite so active as the other. Plenty of vegetables are a blessing to a housewife, and help wonderfully to surround the farmer's table with good cheer.—F. D. Curtis, Kirby Homestead, N. Y.

Strabberries.

This is a berry which all can raise. To have them in perfection, as they have no superiors, it must be perfectly ripened on the vines and eaten a few hours after they are picked. Those shipped here from a distance look like strawberries, but they have lost their flavor and health inspiring principle. Any one can have them fresh except the man who is willing to sacrifice many of the comforts of life and health by crowding into the towns and cities. The last half of April is the best season for setting out strawberries. Take time and care in setting out. Make the soil fine and mellow, spread out the roots carefully, but do not press the dirt too hard against the plant. But above all be careful that the central bud is not covered with dirt. If the plant has many full fresh leaves, most of them should be cut off, and do not set too deep. Three square rods will furnish berries enough for a large family. In their season there is nothing like them.—Des Moines Register.

Pepper, Pure and Adulterated.

Pepper, when freshly ground, has an appetizing, fragrant smell and taste, that the best store article rarely approaches. Black and white pepper are from the same berry, the difference being simply in the preparation. The outer husk of the berry is black, the inner seed being much lighter, or nearly white. The best pepper is made from the whole berry ground up, husks and all. Those who are now coming home from Europe, often bring back a pretty little pepper mill for the table, to be used instead of a pepper box. It is filled with whole pepper, and holding it in one hand you turn a little handle with the other, and grind a few grains of fresh, fragrant peper into your soup or stew. Black pepper is largely adulterated. The pepper husks from the London made white pepper manufacturers, are for sale on this side of the Atlantic for only a few cents a pound. The whole pepper costs at the importers' say 15 cents per pound. Pepper of pepper husks, mustard husks, and ground rice or flour, can be sold for as many cents the ounce, as the pepper husks cost per pound, and seem quite like pepper, too. It smells peppery, but it is not tempting, and it is no wonder that we often hear people say, "I very seldom take pepper."

Pansies and Verbenas.

Pansies, in this country are universally grown from seed, which is sown or transplanted at various periods—in autumn for the next spring, and late in the winter for summer; some persons keep up continuous cultivation, sowing and transplanting frequently. To guard young plants against damping or decaying at the root, transplant into shallow boxes, about an inch apart, and keep them rather cool, warm enough, however, to assure good growth. All plants raised in the house, or in a hotbed, should be hardened by partial exposure before planting in the ground. When we do not produce large, fine pansies it may be owing to the want of a sheltered nook for them—a cool moist place—or the seed may not be good, and we may not understand how much food they require.

The greatest gourmand that you can imagine is not more imperious in his demands than are these modest looking flowers, hence you cannot get the soil too deep or too rich. They delight in moisture, while liquid manure is an elixir. Our grandmothers used to have leach-tubs set up in the spring for the purpose of making soap; we need leach-tubs set up in a similar way for distilling fertilizers. It is astonishing how a little dressing tells, especially in a liquid form. It should always be used weak, just in a dormant state. I have obtained as good blooms generally from mixed German seeds as from any other, though I often buy the French odier and English extra choice.

Verbenas are easily raised from seed, although a little slow in starting. Soaking the seed, also the use of a hotbed, will facilitate the process, but they can be raised in a warm place in the house, and duly prepared in time for the bed or border. Plants thus grown are strong and healthy; much more so than those from cuttings, but the trouble is they cannot be depended on for color. When you send to a florist you know what you have, and you can dispose your scarlet, white and purple colors, and their variations, so as to form a beautiful bed. Not so with seedlings. Still, they seem to be satisfactory to many amateurs, and our florists strongly recommend them, not neglecting to raise cuttings, however, from their old stock.

I had a little trial of seedlings a few summers since, and all that has been said of their vigor was more than realized. I will not speak of their luxuriance, or attempt to tell how high they grew, how much they bunched, or how far they ran, for their dimensions were incredible. There were some eighteen or twenty plants on a bed ten feet in diameter, and although covered with a redundance of flowers it was far from attractive. I went to it repeatedly to pull out some of the plants, or try to improve it in some way, but upon close examination I could not make up my mind to sacrifice one of the number; they were so delicate, so beautifully shaded and tinted; there were soft lilac, tender rose, baby blue, and all conceivable variations of these colors, except a pure white, a good rich pink and scarlet. These were entirely wanting.—New York Tribune.

Spring-Time Follies.

The dude's disguise: "Did you go to the grand ball last evening?" inquired a merchant of a dude. "Yaws, I was there," was the languid reply. "What costume did you wear?" "O, my wegular dwess suit, ye knaw." "Ah! then you were disguised as a gentleman."—Boston Post.

The Jeromes: "I hear," said Mrs. Silvermine, "that Mr. Cash has bought a picture by Jerome, "for which he paid $10,000." "You don't say so," said Mr. Silvermine, laying aside the morning paper; "which of the Jeromes painted it—Lawrence or Leonard?"—New York Mail and Express.

A fair retort: "Mrs. Mountjoy Belassis (after several collisions)—"It strikes me, Mr. Rudderford you're much more at home in a boat than in a ball room!" Little Bobby Rudderford (the famous Oxbridge coxswain)—"Yes, by Jove! And I'd sooner steer eight men than one woman any day!"—London Punch, Quite an awful affair: First dude, with an embarrassed smile—"Say, Augustus, I really believe I've broken a corset lacing. Have you an extra one with you?" Second dude, with an expression of horror—"Really! why, Algernon, where could you fix it if I had one?" The gyurls are all looking at us, ye know."—Hartford Post.

Won without wooing: "My hearers," began the lecturer, "I trust——" Before he could proceed further a babel of voices shouted: "We'll trade with you; we'll trade with you. Never you fear for that." "The citizens thought he was going to open a grocery in town and that he had risen to announce the fact.—Boston Transcript.

"What is promised to the righteous?" asked a mild and amiable Sunday-school teacher of a small child at the far end of her class. "Eternal bliss," quickly responded the child. "Quite right, my dear child," said the mild and amiable. "And now tell me what is promised to the wicked?" "Eternal blister, ma'am," was the prompt reply. The teacher pronounced it theologically correct, but peculiarly expressed.

VOL. VII NO. 1.

Which indicates that THE JOURNAL enters upon its seventh year with this issue. THE JOURNAL has passed through various experiences during the six years of its life but enters upon its seventh year with brighter prospects and higher hopes than ever. Trusting to merit the united and hearty support of its many friends THE JOURNAL enters upon another year's duties with renewed hopes and bright anticipations. We make no vain pledges but shall do our best to live up to our motto.

PUSH!

What Determination and Hard Work Has Done.

Improvements Already Begun on Ssmpson's Addition an Earnest of Those Promised.

A few weeks ago, when it first became known that the property now called Sampson's Addition would be platted and put on the spring market, nearly all who knew the land well, and its location relatively to the city, began making preparations to buy so soon as the lots would be on sale. Why this high, rolling, river encircled land, thrust by the great bend in the river within three blocks of the business center of our bustling city, should find such favor with the majority, needs no explanation to those who have ever seen it. The poor man, the man of moderate means, likes to have his unpretentious cottage as beautifully situated as possible, he wants it near his business, sheltered from the cutting winds of our frigid winters, and, in this country, he looks for a dry cellar and a good well. And when all these are offered him in at low prices and on easy terms, is it any wonder that he buys, then?

Every patriotic citizen wishes to see Crookston keep her place as the Queen City of the Valley, and if to any one thing more than another she owes that place, that one is her pleasant, sheltered position in the wooded basin of the Red Lake River, and if the limits of the city extend, as they must, it should be along the same basin; westward every live town in this country has grown, does grow, and WILL grow, and does not Sampson's Addition lie in this basin, and due west of the heart of the town?

But this is not all, nor even the beginning of our answer to the "Why" of the anxious inquirer. The promises at first made by the Crookston Improvement Company are in a fair way to fulfilment. The streets of the new addition are rapidly being graded by a large force of men, and, by the way, on account of the sandy nature of the soil, these streets will always be dry and clean.

The contract for the large 250 barrel flouring mill has been let to Walker & Baily, and the foundation for the mill will be laid within the week. The Morrisey Bros. have bought mill-lots and have contracted to put up a foundry and a machine shop. Six dwelling houses are already building, and over thirty more are secured by contract to be built before November next. We are not afraid to prophesy that over one hundred dwelling will be built on this addition within six months. The company have inserted in most of their contracts with purchasers an agreement to build one wagon and one foot bridge within six months, and wire cables for the latter have now been ordered and no doubt we shall be able to cross the river on a in two weeks. The wagon bridge, the company purpose building is to be a low waterpile bridge, just such a one as has served the people of Fargo and Moorhead for more than five years. This, of course, will necessitate the removal of stringers and planks every spring, leaving the people of the Woodland Addition (or Fifth ward) without a wagon bridge for perhaps two or three weeks But mark you, long before another spring comes round, our city fathers will see that this growing ward is connected with the city.

THE SIDE TRACK

of the St. P., M. & Manitoba road has been located and surveyed, and will beyond question be graded and laid in a month. There is talk, which we have every reason to believe is more than talk, of continuing this track across the river to meet the Grand Forks branch.

Intelligence Office and Laundry.

Having removed my laundry to the building just north of the Clements blocks I am now prepared to do all work in the laundry line entrusted to my care neatly and with promptness at large reduced rates. Old friends and patrons and new ones are cordially invited to give me a call at my new quarters. I have also opened an intelligent office and girls desiring good places and ladies desiring reliable help are invited to call at my office, two doors north of the Clements Block on Broadway.

County News.

St. Hilaire Happenings.

From the Spectator.

The ice on the river left for parts unknown on Monday morning last, and now the noble Red River flows swiftly and joyfully on, as if glad to throw off its winter robes.

Mr. S Harris has leased the St. Hilaire Hotel and will open it up for the accommodation of the public, about the first of May. Mr. H. is an old hotel man, and will no doubt have a good run of custom.

Mr. Ritchie passed through here on Monday last, with his drive of cord wood. He has about three hundred cords which he is floating down to Crookston on the river. We fear Mr. R. will have his hands full before he arrives at his destination.

Mr. C. C. Utzinger's building is almost completed, and he will move into it on Friday next. He has put up a mammoth sign and has given the building a fresh coat of paint. C. C. has now the largest and handsomest structure in St Hilaire. He intends giving a grand ball when his hall is completed.

The wife and family of Mr. Geo Crocker arrived from Crookston on Thursday last and are for the present occupying part of Mr. S. O. Cundy's residence. Mr. Crocker's house is nearing completion, his furniture has all arrived and in a short time he will have his family comfortably located in his new quarters.

Sorsoliel & Campbell have finish sawing all the logs in their yard and have shut down their mill for the season. During the past four months they have sawed in the vicinity of 300,000 feet of native lumber, every foot of which has been used in the erection of buildings in and around St. Hilaire. When we take into consideration the fact that at least 500,000 more has been shipped in here from Crookston and other points, and that a large number of the farm houses in this section are being built of logs, it shows that St. Hilaire, even in the middle of a very severe winter has been making improvements of which a much larger and more important city might well feel proud.

Ex-mayor Allen, of Crookston, took advantage of his pass over the St. H. & L. of W. Ry., and walked up on the grade on Friday last, to pay homage to the Young Chicago, and make final arrangements for the brick yard which he is establishing here. He spent Saturday in testing the clay and found that there were two varieties from which a superior quality of both red and white brick could be manufactured. A Quaker machine has been purchased which will be shipped up here as soon as the roads are in good condition. For the present Mr. Allan will employ about fifteen men, but will enlarge the force as business increases. Tally one more for St. Hilaire.

Red Lake Times.

Many strangers in town lately, looking for lands and locations. The boom is beginning to come.

John Labree, of Thief river is now erecting a store building which he will stock up with general merchandise to supply his largely increasing trade.

The ditch which was dug last fall from the railroad track to the river is blocked up and the water has broken through the small dam and is taking its old natural course.

There is good clay here both for brick and pottery, and the parties who start a brick yard here will strike a bonanza as there will be a large demand for brick here next summer. Wood can also be be had at reasonable prices.

P. C. Sletten, Receiver of the U. S. Land Office at Crookston, says he will be up at St. Hilaire in a few days to invest in real estate; it shows that our wide awake business men have an eye to this future lumbering and manufacturing city.

Judge Ives has part of the material on the ground, and will soon erect a building 24 by 60 feet, and two stories high. The upper story will be used as a city hall, and the lower story will be occupied by Eiken Brothers, as a hardware store.

Thomas Libby's hotel is nearly finished. In style and structure it will compare favorably with any house in Northwestern Minnesota and his large expertience in hotel business will warrant his customers first clas accommodation in every respect. We wish him abundansuccess.

We are informed by Tom. Sanwick that Judge Ives has rented rooms at Libby's hotel, and will soon be a permanent resident of the metropolis, St. Hilaire. The Judge is heavily interested in our town and also has the management of the original town site. We wish him good health and a prosperous future.

Carman Carvings.

Carman Courier.

E. D. Childs and S. Kimball both returned yesterday, after a brief absence.

W. D. Bailey opens the ball this morning, by seeding on the home farm in Carman.

S. Kimball, with his old friend and schoolmate Rolla Noyes, left for Grand Forks the first of the week; thence Kimball goes to the front, in the region of Devil's Lake.

Geo. D. Erskine of Racine Wis., has shipped horses and other material requisite to the running of the new brick yard north of our school house. The lessees of the yard, Smedes & Vance, will commence the work immediately. Carman welcomes all such enterprises with hearty good will, that tend to advance her business prosperity.

Red Lake Falls Doings.

From the Messenger.

The business of the Red Lake Falls Post Office is increasing rapidly and the demand for a daily mail is becoming imperative.

The ice in Red Lake River, in going out tested pretty thoroughly the solidity of the work at Kretzschmar's race, but without doing the least damage.

The ice in Red Lake River started out on Friday the first break commencing at about 9 a.m. By eleven o clock the river was clear, and the bridge entirely safe.

Buse & Colbentson were busy on Friday last putting booms in the Clearwater, in anticipation of the arrival of their logs. The river was at that time clear of ice for over fifteen miles above town.

Hotel room is getting terribly scarce, and "two in a bed and one in the middle," is becoming a dread reality, and cots are at a high premium. What will it be when the improved condition of our roads brings the inevitable rush?

Detling, Hayes & Hamry have ordered a powerful stump puller which will be here within two or three weeks at furtherst and will be used in clearing streets in their addition. If we are not much mistaken, there is ample work in town for another for some time.

Mr. C. L. Brainard, our county serveyor, returned on Saturday from his trip up the Clearwater, where he has been engaged for a week surveying two new town sites, Rockville and Terrebonne. He will have plats of them completed within a few days, when they will be filed in the recorder's office. The first, Rockville, owned by Mr. Rock Lizee, is on the north side of the Clearwater, in township 151, range 42, and distant about twelve miles from here. There is a good water power there which is partly improved by dam, furnishing a 10 foot head, and a sawmill, the owner of which, under his contract with Mr. Lizee, is to add a flouring mill, on or before November 1st next. They now have about six thousand logs on hand, and the mill will be run steadily this season. There is a fair prospect of a store being opened there soon, and other improvements will probably follow.

The second candidate for public favor is Terrebonne, in section 2 in the township of that name, on the South side of Clearwater River ten miles from Red Lake Falls, and is the property of Mr. Cadieux. At this place Ames Bros., lately of Hutchinson, Minn. have put up a 35 horse power steam mill on the mill reserve of twelve acres and are running steadily on native timber. In addition to lumber for local demand, they will get out material for a large flouring mill and for the dam which will at once be put in to utilize their valuable water power. The location of the dam and race will be settled as soon as Mr. Brainard can return. There is now at Terrebonne, a blacksmith shop and a saloon. Negotations are about completed with a party who will build a store and stock it, and another person has contracted for three lots, on which he will at once build a large boarding house and hotel. Both these new towns are well located, and possess much beauty, beside being backed by a well settled and rich agricultural district. We wish the owners success, and are glad to see them make the move, as all such villages will eventually be so many gems in the crown of our City Red Lake Falls.

Immigration is on the increase evidently. Three teams employed by Morrison & Ledeboer last week to bring a lot of merchandise from Crookston, found enough passengers awaiting transportation to pay for the trip, and left the merchandise "until a more convenient season."

Mr. McClatchie is superintending the sinking of an artiesian well in Mrs. Zeh's block in Miles' addition. It has now reached a depth of 160 feet, and indications are that a flowing well will be had within 200 feet. If this experiment and Mr. Langevin's are both successful the question of flowing wells in town will be pretty well settled.

EDITOR JOURNAL: Our town is booming the same as the rest of the country. Three years ago there was not a white settler in the township; now we have in the neighborhood of one hundred voters.

The supervisors have been busy laying out roads this spring; we believe in good roads.

Seeding has commenced; the we weather wont trouble us much.

Mr. Andrew A. Olson started for Minneapolis this week to see some doctor. He has been in ill health the last part of the winter.

Among our young bachelors who have been getting house keepers of their own are Lars Lexwall and Chris Olson, they thought, at the time, to keep the thing a secret, but the noisy appearence of their friends at night showed them they could not do so.

Red Lake Falls Doings.

From the Messenger.

Seeding well under way.

The grade to the Clearwater bridge badly needs repairing.

Work on both excavating and pile driving is being pushed from the lower end of Kretzschmar's race. Pattenaud, the contractor on excavating, expects to finish his work in about three weeks.

Miss. Hall commenced a private school last Monday, in the public school house on Bottineau Avenue.

Banker Wm. Ross, and Postmaster Jacobus of Crookston visited the new Metropolis Saturday last, remaining till Sunday.

Died.

Mrs Leger was the first woman to locate in Red Lake Falls, and her loss will be regretted by a wide circle of acquaintances. She leaves a husband and seven children.

At 10 a. m. April 25, of consumption, Daniel Bottineau, at the age of 28 years

He came to Red Lake Falls from Minneaoplis in 1877, residing here from that time until his death, and leaves a wife and three young children. His father, Pierre Bottineau, who had been absent in Minneaplis, arrived the day of his death, but too late to see him alive.

St. Hilaire Happenings.

From the Spectator.

Mr. Geo. Crocker has moved his family into his Riverside cottage and is now happy.

Quite a number of our inhabitants are out in the country holding down their claims.

Miss Van Wie returned from her visit to Crookston last evening and has again taken charge of her flock.

The saloon men have been obliged to go down pretty deep in their pockets to find the funds requisite for paying their liquor license this year. The license is now $130.00, being $50 more than last year.

Mr. Geo. Campbell formerly a member of the firm of Sorsoliel & Campbell has disposed of his interest in the saw mill and is preparing to make a trip to Red Lake. He is selecting his outfit and will start as soon as the roads are improved.

The POLK COUNTY JOURNAL has just closed the sixth year of its existence. During this time the JOURNAL has worked hard for the advancement of Polk County and well deserves the liberal patronage it is getting

Not a day passes without witnessing the arrival of a large number of immigrants and land hunters. They come with anxious faces but when they have secured 160 acres of the finest land in the Red River Valley the anxious expression vanishes and is immediately succeed by one of happiness.

The farmers are all busily engaged in putting in their crops. It is estimated that the acreage of grain sown in this vicinity this year will be five times as large as that of last season. The farmers are apparently finding out that there is money made in raising No. 1 hard in this part of the Valley.

Mr. S. W. Ritchie made a successful trip to Crookston with his raft of cordwood. He started from his place five miles north of here at eight o'clock in the morning and arrived at Crookston about eleven o,clock the same evening. The distance by river is about one hundred miles and Mr. R. made a very rapid voyage considering the kind of vessel he had to manage.

Fisher's Fancies.

From the Bulletin.

The importance of Fisher is manifesting itself to the railway officials. Freight trains are to be run on this section of railroad in future as well as passenger trains, and there will be no more mixed trains.

One of the most cowardly acts ever perpetrated in Fisher, was performed this week. It appear that the bridge on the road near Mr. L. Freeman's farm meets with some one's disapproval and consequently one night the mal-contents sawed the stringers through, leaving the bridge standing in its place, but in such form that should a horse pass over it it would inevitably cave in. Fortunately Mr. Freeman discovered before passing over the bridge, that something was wrong and got out of his buggy to inspect, when he discovered the outrage. Had he gone on he would have in all probability lost his life. The perpetrator of this outrage seems to forget there are such things as "Vigilance Committes," but some of the citizens should quietly jog his memory as to the fact and if that is not sufficient, practically demonstrate it.

The O'Briens are entertaining their brother James, who is from Illinois, a tinner by trade, and an agreeable young gentleman.

W. J. Hammond, a son-in-law of N. E. Cole, who bought the Russell property, is now cultivating the land, and will become a permanent settler.

There have already been erected five new buildings in this village this spring, and others to follow. Few towns of the size of Fisher can give so good a showing.

The authorities of the village had the roads harrowed down this week, with a consequence, that the roads this spring are the best they ever have been, and better really could not be wished for.

Uncle Daniel Cameron has returned from a visit to Scotland.

Mr. Geo. Q. Erskine has returned to the city for the summer.

The County board after a short session adjourned on Wednesday.

Mr. A. Allen is getting his brick yard in fine shape for a large season's work.

The ladies of the Congregational Society will hold a fair some evening about May 18th.

Jake Francis is bothered about his seeding, owing to a lame horse that was badly corked a short time since.

Mr. Knute Steenerson, of the St. Hilaire Times, was in the city on Wednesday. He reports lively times up there.

The Smede's & Vance brick yard at Carman is being put in shape for business. A large kiln shed is being built and will soon be ready for business.

Marshal McDonald is doing good work cleaning up the streets and causing the removal of unsightly piles of rubbish from back and front yards.

McCulough has ornamented the front of Leech & McManus' real estate office with a nobby sign and a star—tling big red business which means the red star.

Dr. A. A. Just has been on the sick list for a few days, unable to attend any other patient. He is getting about a little and will, we trust, soon be on deck ready for his regular rations.

Pretty near time for ice and to be up with the times Ruedy & Kindler have started their ice wagon, which fact they announce in a neat little card to the JOURNAL readers.

Mr. D. M. Durkee, the city milkman, goes to Wisconsin to consult an eminent occulist. He has had considerable trouble with his eyes and we trust he may receive the benefit he hopes for.

Mr. R.D. Hoskins, of the Bathgate Sentinel paid our city a flying visit during last week. Mr. H. has made a change for the better in the Sentinel and will make a first-class sheet of it.

The real estate office indeed has been set back but Aleck opens out promptly in the building on Broadway recently occupied by the laundry and bobs up serenely with a big list of real estate to buy and sell.

Drop in and size up Bond & Steenerson's list of real estate. It is the boss, and the bargains they offer are surprising in these times They have some of the choicest property at figures within the reach of all.

We notice that a large number of shade trees have been set out on the school house grounds. This is a good idea and many citizens might take the hint to their advantage and add beauty to our city.

Mr. Henry Nolan informs the JOURNAL that he has taken the contract for building a pile bridge over the river to East Crookston and has ordered the lumber and piles and will build the bridge as soon as the material can be got on the ground.

Ole Bang will open out a hotel in his old sample room building on Saturday next and invites his friends, when sojourning in the city to call upon him. He will make extensive improvements and be ready to entertain his friends in first-class style.

Mr. O. P. Renne, of Rindal, Norman Co., paid our city a visit this week, and, like every sensible man left his name on our list and our bank acount swelled to the extent of just one more subscription. He reports seeding well advanced in that locality.

Joe Netzer has just placed a handsome bottle case in Warninger & Trombly's sample room. It is made of pine, walnut, butternut, rosewood, ash, and oak. Peter Siebel had a hand in the making and it shows him to be indeed an artist of merit.

Sheriff Zwickey went in hot haste to Carman on Tuesday to arrest a party accused of stealing a blanket and a chaire. The victim was brought before Esq. Lilly, who, not finding a very clear case made out gave the individual the chance of working upon the road a while or leaving town.

Daily Stage to Red Lake Falls.

Dr. A. Nelson was up from Garfield this week.

Henry Burkhardt left for Wabasha on Sunday evening.

Wheat will be nearly all sowed this week and the balance of the sowing nearly so.

Lovely weather in these days and the seed is being put in the ground at a lively rate.

Martin Bang has rented Pete Misgen's sample room and will open out in fine style in a short time.

Capt. J. K. Arnold put in an appearance on Saturday last. The Capt. talks of reviving the Northern Tier.

The Madison Square Company are announced to appear in Ericsson's Hall on Wednesday evening May 16th 1883.

R. C. Burkhardt arrived on Saturday, accompanied by his wife. They will make Crookston their home this summer.

Mr. L. Brin came up on a visit to his brother, I. Brin, on Friday. We notice that on the ticket suit he has come out victorious.

Mr. Wm. Kistenmacher is getting the material on the ground for a fine residence. Joe Netzer has the contract for building.

Mr. E. R. Ross, of Warren dropped in to chat with us awhile on Tuesday. Says that seeding is far advanced in Marshall Co.

Miss Phosa McAllister will appear at Ericsson's Hall on Thursday evening May 18th. This company is among the best traveling.

J. M. Palmer, of Angus was in attendance on the meeting of the County Board on Tuesday. He says farmers are very busy seeding in that neighborhood.

Capt. Soule, he of the Russia farms was in on Saturday, enjoying life in the great city with his many friends. He says the seeders are humming down his way.

The city council have caused a fine railing to be placed across the hall to exclude them from contact with the common crowd and have also put in a neat, long table at which to sit while deliberating the weighty matters of the city.

R. W. Ranney came up from Glyndon to look after his well-digging operations in this county. He is after a deep well or so at Fisher and when he gets through there will come to Crookston and try for one at Mr. J. R. Clement's residence on the avenue.

Max Ericsson has secured a rare treat for the people of this city in the engagement of the famous Remenyi who will give a concert in Ericsson's hall on Wednesday evening, May 30th. Remenyi is the greatest violinist of the age and all lovers of good music should not fail to hear him.

Ice, good; ice cream, better; ice cream sociable, best. This is what the ladies of the Baptist church give at their chapel in Crookston next Friday evening. Come and have some ice cream also enjoy the music, reading and recitations that will be given. Remember Friday evening May 11th. Admission to the hall 10 cents.

The contract for building the Congregational church was let to Mr. G. W. Bishop, of Minneapolis who will prepare the material at Minneapolis and ship it here ready to be put into the building at once. He expects to commence here in about five weeks and then it will take thirty days to complete the structure

While many houses are being built every week the demand largely exceeds the supply. Those who invest in houses to rent have a bonanza. There is scarcely a day passes that we do not hear some one asking "do you know where I could rent a house?" Such being the case it is a matter of surprise that more capitol is not invested. Money in tenement houses in this city pays a greater per cent than in lands or government bonds.

The fire bell called out the department in just about ten seconds less than no time on Tuesday evening about six o'clock. At the first tap of the bell Tom Morris jumped half way to the engine house and at the second tap, which located the fire in the second ward Tom had hold of the nozzle of the hose cart, and was promptly at the hydrant on Medical Hall corner ere yet the wild alarum rang out, announcing to our citizens that a first-class fire had arrived in the city and would proceed to give an exhibition at once. But the bell and the department were so alarmingly prompt that the poor miserable apology for a fire was scared to death at once—flickered and went out ere scarcely any one knew that a chimney in the laundry north of the Clement's Block had taken it into its head to burn out. Talking of fires, though, reminds us that the city has plenty of material for a No. 1 fire company and one should be organized and maintained.

On Wednesday evening, May 2d, by Rev. H. C. Minton, Mr. John McLean, of this city, and Miss Jennie Todd of Collingwood.

Upon reading the above notice in the Duluth News, the two bachelor John McLeans, of this city blushed scarlet and straightway began to inquire among themselves, "is it me?" At last accounts they were both on the war path after a little pop wherewith to slay the News man for the cruel insinuation.

On Wed [illegible] received a commun [illegible] Aldal May 10th which [illegible] y sent us for publicati [illegible] ges on one of the rules o [illegible] -regulated newspaper we cannot publish it. We have often stated in these columns that we will not print any communication, however good, unless we know who wrote it. This correspondent writes an entirely personal letter and evidently expects us to print it but does not repose confidence enough in us to reveal his name. Now, while we are ever ready to receive communications, containing scraps of local news yet we are not so ready, nor anxious to perpetuate every little neighborhood quarrel by publishing personal screeds and we always exercise our right to cut out everything of this nature from our correspondents' articles. Nor do we care much for abstract subjects theoretically discussed which may appear (to the writer) to be very deep and learned, very important that the dear public should know, but what we do like is a newsy letter—items of general interest, not only to that certain locality, but also to the county at large. Such letters find a hearty welcome to the columns of the JOURNAL, yet even these MUST ALWAYS contain the real name of the writer in order to find a place in our columns. Some times errors will creep in for which we will under no circumstances consent to be responsible and we must always know who is. If "ADVISER" will write us a good news letter and tell us who he or she may be the communication will receive a hearty welcome, otherwise, as in this case we must decline with thanks.

Mr. Edwin McManus, of Fergus Falls, has been on a visit to his brothers in this city for a few days. Leaves for home to-night

On Saturday last at about 5:30 our citizens were startled by the report that a man had just been drowned at the dam. Upon arriving at the dam our reporter learned that it was too true, that Mr. Chase's foreman, Mr. E B. Larson, had been drowned and active preparations were being made to drag the river in search of the body. The particulars gleaned showed that Larson, with two other men were upon a flatboat just above the dam engaged in some work upon the dam. The flatboat was managed by means of a rope stretched across the river from bank to bank the boat attached to it by means of smaller ropes and pulleys. In some way the boat became unmanagable when just in the chute and Larson unfastened one end of the rope in order to allow the boat to pass through the chute, but, instead of doing so it went over the dam, throwing Mr. Larson over-board and apparently hurting him as he seemed to handle himself with a great difficulty, and one of the men says he heard Larson say that he was hurt, while struggling in the water Seeing the danger the two remaining men was in Mr. Chase at once unfastened the main rope thus allowing the boat to pass over the falls in safety and enabling the men to get to shore. A large body of men unsuccessfully dragged the river until Monday, when it appearing useless to continue the search that way men were sent down the river in boats to search.

A SPANISH BULL FIGHT.

How a Sunday is Spent in Madrid—Glory and Honor Won in the Bloody Arena—Three Acts in a Brutal Tragedy—A Scene that Only Hardened Spaniards Can Witness Unmoved.

It was a bright, beautiful Sunday in December in Madrid. "Plaza de Toros!" The coachman did not need the order. Where else would any one be going that day! So we drove out past the pleasant Buen Retiro gardens, through the hurrying crowd, swarming from every direction, but with faces all turned one way—people on foot, on horseback, in tram, omnibus, cab and carriage; people of all ages and both sexes, and every condition of life; caballeros in their cloaks, senoritas in coquettish mantillas, working-men in blouse and scarf and sombroro, peasant women with cotton handkerchiefs tied over their heads in lieu of lace mantillas, mothers carrying their babies, fathers leading their boys, natives and foreigners—many streams, but all converging toward one spot. That spot was a great yellow brick structure, that might be seen long before getting to it. This was the Plaza de Toros, the circus, the amphitheatre where the bull fights are held. It seats about 15,000 spectators, and is constructed much like the old Roman Ampitheatres, except that it is a circular instead of an oval form. The immense area is inclosed by a barrier four or five feet in height. Beyond the outer barrier are the seats for the spectators—stone benches, numbered, at first rising tier upon tier; then gallaries furnished with leathern cushioned chairs and wooden benches, finally boxes designed for the king and court, the ministry, municipality, foreign embassies and the aristocracy of the city. The real division of the upper from the lower classes is by the side of the circus, the former occupying what is known as the sombra or shady side, which always brings much higher prices. Four gates in the inner barrier, equi-distant from one another, admit to the arena, respectively, the heralds, the horses, the combatants and the bulls. The herald takes his position in a balcony over the toril or entrance for the bulls; the band is stationed opposite. In dark inclosures beneath the gallery are kept the bulls in waiting for sport, There, also, is the infirmary, with surgeon in attendance, where the wounded toreros are caried. Formerly there was a chapel in connection with the ring, where the combatants went to pray and confess before beginning the struggle, and where mass was said during the fighting. Now, it appears they rely more upon their own prowess than on supernatural aid; and the only religious part of the performance is vested in the priest, who, with the consecrated host, stands ready to administer absolution and ghostly consolation to the dying gladiator.

The place rapidly filled up. The blare of the herald's trumpet announced the opening of the first act of the performance proper. Three picadores on horseback rode or were rather dragged into the arena. The horses were as sorry specimens of their race, as wooden-looking Rosinantes as ever did equine duty. What black paint and oil brushing the gay trappings could do for them it had done; but all the artifice in the world couldn't conceal the broken knees, the spavined joints, the protruding bones and the hollow flanks. In the olden days of chivalry, before the beautiful sport had degenerated into vulgar butchery by professionals, and none but high born knights and gentlemen entered the arena, and then only for the purpose of exhibiting their dexterity in horsemanship and their prowess with the lance, then only the finest steeds were ridden; now that the horse has become but a target for the bull's horns, only such are employed as are worthless from a money point of view. The picadores had a costume of their own—a low, broad-brimmed sombrero, a large cape and heavy leathern breeches lined with strips of iron, to protect their legs from the sharp horns of the bull. Each was armed with a long lance, which, however, was a weapon of defense rather than attack, it having a point but about an inch in length. The object of the picador is to thrust this point into the bull's neck as he makes a lunge for the horse, and hold him off by main strength until he turns his attack to another quarter. The three picadors stationed themselves at different parts of the ring, against the barrier, in such position as to receive the attack of the bull from the right side. Then the trumpet sounded, and every eye turned toward the toril, whence the bull was to enter.

A smothered cry of delight greeted him as he came in—a great, beautiful, massive creature; that looked as though he might have swept the arena with one shake of his superb head, and tossed his assailants sky high out of the circus with those magnificient horns. The picadores recognized the qualities of their foe, and braced themselves steadily in the saddle, with lance firmly grasped, to await the onset. He stood a moment at the entrance as if staggered by the sudden glare of light and the novelty of his position. It was only for a moment. His quick, roving eye had caught sight of an enemy. Lowering his head he made direct for the nearest horse. The watchful picador was on his guard. The lance descended swiftly, and the bull stood transfixed with astonishment at the unexpected reception. No sound of approval greeted the skillful thrust that had saved the horse. This was not what the spectators wanted. The bull shook himself free from the dart, and rushed toward another antagonist. The picador who had escaped rode across the arena and and got position for another attack.

The second horseman was not so happy in receiving the assault. The spear grazed the bull's neck and the bull's horns grazed the iron bound calf of the horseman's leg and buried themselves in the horse's belly, laying open a fearful gash. The blood flowed like water and the entrails protruded from the open gap. The people clapped their hands and shouted. The rider spurred the trembling animal to the opposite side of the arena, a track of blood marking his course, his entrails dangling against his legs. The attendants came with needle and thread, stuffed back the horrible mass, sewed up the wound and stopped the leakage with tow. Meanwhile the fun was growing warm. Another horse had received his death wound from the cruel horns, which had ripped him open as cleanly as a Chinaman's knife could perform the hari kari. The horse sank on his knees. The rider retained his seat and dug his spurs into the flanks of the beast. The attendants tried to force him up, but it was useless. He made a desperate effort to rise, and fell over in the death struggle. The rider dismounted and went off for a horse. The scene was exciting. The taurian blood was up. Again and again he had been repulsed, and again and again he had returned to the charge with renewed fury, his horns dripping with gore, his eyes rolling in rage. Baffled, he came back to glut his vengeance on his prostrate and disembowelled foe, burying his horns in the still palpitating flesh and bathing his head in blood. The sight had become sickening. I turned from the arena to look at the spectators. There were blanched faces but they were the faces of Englishmen and Frenchmen, not of Spaniards. Still every eye was glued by a strange fascination to the arena. Things began to mix themselves up and lose their identity, as when one looking long and fixedly at an object presently loses all sense of its form and meaning. There was a confused mingling of bright colors in which that of blood predominated. There was a confused mass of mangled carcasses, with foam streaked horses and rampant bull flying over the bloodsown arena. From being indistinguishable things became indistinct. The air grew thick and dark. The earth seemed slipping away. The cries of "Bravo toro!" "Viva toro!" had a far-off and unnatural sound. I heard an Englishman beside me exclaim, in tones of horror: "Good God!" I roused myself and looked. A horse already weakened by the loss of blood, had fallen under a savage attack, carrying his rider with him. Man and horse were at the mercy of their powerful and relentless enemy, who, as though possessed by a thousand demons, with hoof and horn, was stamping and tearing out life and likeness. "It is death," said a Spaniard, and went on smoking his cigarrito. At the first moment of danger the chulos—who are a sort of reserve force always on the field whose duty it is to lure the bull away from a man who is in peril—had rushed to the rescue, waving their red flags in the face of the assailant. But the infuriated animal was not easily diverted from his prey, and when his fury was satiated there was not much left in the semblance of a horse. They dragged the man out from under the remnants of his steed, that had partly covered him from the assaults of the bull. He was alive; perhaps it would have been better had he been dead. Bleeding and broken, they bore him to the infirmary; and another came and took his place.

All this took less time in the performance than it has in the description. When the trumpet sounded at the close of the first act three mangled horses lay dead on the bloody field; and the three that had taken their places, stabbed and torn, were led out to have their wounds sewed up or cauterized, that they might be again led forth to the slaughter.

In the second act of the tragedy the the bandilleros were the chief performers. These dressed as the chulos, in a pretty and picturesque costume—jacket of satin or velvet in purple, orange or crimson, and covered with gold and silver embroidery, short breeches of the same, white stockings and slippers with rosettes and silken girdles. With their slight forms, beardless faces and manner of wearing their hair, which was knotted behind and hung on the neck in a silken net, they looked more like girls in a masquerade than men and bull-baiters. Each one carried two barbed darts ornamented with colored papers. The bull regarded these new enemies cautiously, as though undecided how to receive them. One of these approached him, brandishing his arms and taunting him with shout and gesture. It was to be war then. The bull accepted the challenge. The man stood his ground. It was a moment of cruel suspense to the novice among the spectators. It seemed certain death for the banderillero. But just as it seemed that the horns would pierce the man's body, the latter, with the speed of lightning, planted his arrows in the bull's neck, one on each side, and adroitly slipped out of range. The bull shook his head savagely, but the darts stuck fast. There was a flying leap and the man was saved, but it was not a moment too soon. Had he been a thoughtless agile he was lost; had he made a false step it was his last. A similar feat was repeated again and again by other banderillos. Before the act closed the bull was frantic with pain.

Bellowing with rage and agony, the blood running from his neck, the foam whitening his nostrils, he followed his persecutors who had found safety at the barrier, vainly trying in his blind fury to find an outlet or to leap the fence. The trumpet sounded for the final act in the tragedy. Enter the espada. He held in his right hand a sword; in his left, covering a short stick, the muleta, or red flag. The bull, exhausted with continuous effort and pain, had no desire to renew the contest. He sought no more victims; thristed for no more blood. But he was no carven. He saw the red flag and came on to meet it, with an eye that boded little good for a defeated foe. There followed a series of manœuvres on the part of the man, surprising in their ingenuity, daring and skill—manœuvres to provoke, insult, draw or parry, embarrass and enrage the turaine adversary. When the crucial moment came the excitement of the spectators had reached the highest pitch. The bull came on with a momentum accelerated by rage, as though he had gathered all his forces for a final grand coup. More than once before the horns had seemed within an ace of penetrating the man's body. This time it seemed inevitable. Every eye was distended with horror. It was a moment of deathlike silence. Then there was a swift and sudden movement of the espada's right arm; a gleam of steel flashed through the air; and the bull dropped like lead at his feet without the quiver of a muscle. When, a few weeks afterward at Seville, I was describing this incident to a Spaniard, "Ah!" he cried, in a burst of unwonted enthusiasm, "that was Frascuelo, no one but Frascuelo could do that." Frascuelo has been the favorite metadar of Spain for the last decade but he must have been very young when he first won renown in the bull ring, for he looks a mere boy now—a boy of almost girlish beauty. The amphitheatre rang with shouts of applause, and extarvagant cries of endearment and devotion. The hero wiped his sword, flung back his long hair from his flushed countenance and slowly made the circuit of the arena, his fair, frank, beardless face lighted up with smiles that would have won any woman's heart, were she English, Spanish or American. His reception was a continuous ovation. Men threw their caps, capes and cloaks into the arena, which he picked up and laughingly threw back. Women threw kisses to him, which he also smilingly returned. But his smiles and kisses, though freely distributed, were meant only for one that his eye was continually seeking among the crowd. When he found her he leaped lightly over the barrier and handed up to her the rosette of ribbon that he had torn from the mane of his victim. She put it to her lips, and then pinned it on her breast. Meanwhile a number of boys, embryo matadores, had flung themselves into the arena, and were dipping their hands in the warm blood of the bull; as though the sanguinary fluid had a charm to work heroism and success.—Madrid Letter in Detroit News.

Our Young Men.

Many of our young men are suffering from a mental exhaustion, which renders them unfit for business or study. Injurious habits that weaken their constitution are clung to with a pertinacity that is appalling. Young man, stop! let health and perfect manhood be at least one of your chief aims in life. If you already begin to suffer from disturbing dreams, etc., make haste to strengthen the weak portions of your body by using that friend of temperance and long life, that strengthener of every part of the body, Dr. Guysott's Yellow Dock and Sarsaparilla. It will quickly restore your health and keep you from falling into the rapacious clutches of some advertising quack doctor. Be wise in time.

HOW LAURIE WAS WON.

The dining-room door stood open, letting a stream of rosy light out on the snow-covered carriage-drive, and a faint fragrance of delicate coffee and warm-smelling viands on the cold, frosty air, while a fair, girlish face peered anxiously through the heavily curtained window, the red draperies held back by a small, rounded hand, as my husband lifted me from the carriage, and with a warm kiss on my cold cheek said:

"Welcome home, dear! Your home as well as mine, now."

A moment more and I was in the warm, bright room, and, after being cordially met by the old nurse and housekeeper, Mrs. Wait, who had taken care of my husband's house and two children since the death of his first wife, many years before, I was introduced to the little maid whose sweet face I had noticed at the window. I felt at once that I should love the child, with her fair lovely face and clear blue eyes, so like her father's. And the position of stepmother, which I had so much dreaded, assumed an altogether different aspect as I drew Mamie close to me and pressed a kiss upon her smiling lips, while her father looked on well pleased at the meeting between his "little woman," as he was wont to call her, and her new mamma.

Suddenly he seemed to miss something, and turning abruptly to Mrs. Wait, who stood by waiting to show me to my room, with a half-jealous, half-pleased expression on her kindly face, said:

"Where is Laurie? Why isn't he here to meet his mother?" Mamie stole a troubled look at her nurse, and then leaving my side put her little soft hand into her father's gloved palm, and looking beseechingly up into his grave face, as Mrs. Wait, said, in answer to his inquiry:

"Laurie, sir? Why, he had promised to go coasting with some lads this evening, so he took an early supper and left before time for your arrival. He promised some time since, see, and didn't like to disappoint the lads," she added, as my husband frowned slightly.

I felt that all was not right, and a strange feeling of chilliness crept over me as I followed Mrs. Wait to the large, handsome room which had been prepared for my use—a feeling which even the sight of so many of my favorite luxuries, suggested, as I well knew, by my husband's thoughtfulness, could not dispel.

During the remainder of the evening, spent partly at the supper table, and partly in the cozy library, with my husband and Mamie, Laurie's name was not again mentioned; but a strange sadness brooded over me. The old happy freedom of my heart was gone, and somewhere there lurked a vague apprehension, mingled with fear, of what I hardly was conscious, and yet which overwhelmed me to such a degree as to make my future, which had seemed so radiantly bright a few hours before, appear unattractive and lacking.

Tired and disheartened I retired at an early hour, but not to sleep. I lay for hours wrapped in thought about the house which I had entered—a bride of only a few short days—to fill the place of a mother to two motherless children. Myself a mere child, fresh from my own mother's arms, and without experience or understanding, and now, on the night of my arrival, my heart is chilled and disappointed by the knowledge that to at least one of these children my coming is unwelcome. And Laurie, the one I had hoped to win first; Laurie, the boy I had learned to love, because they told me he was like his father, the first one to make me feel that my presence is an intrusion.

Weary with thinking, I at last fell asleep with a prayer on my lips that I might act the part of a true mother to this boy already so dear to me, though I had never seen him, save the likeness of his handsome boyish face which his father gave me, when he said: "I know you'll care for him, Alice, and I'm sure he'll love you. He needs a mother's love sadly, poor boy."

The next morning as I passed down the long hall to the stairway—my husband had gone down to give some orders preparatory to his departure to the city—I heard a merry whistle in the lower hall, and as I ran swiftly down the broad stairs I encountered Laurie coming up two steps at a bound. I stopped on the first landing and held out my hand, while I smiled at sight of the fresh, happy face and handsome face as I said: "Good-morning this is Laurie, I suppose?"

My offered hand was accepted with a gravity and stateliness becoming an old-time knight, as the boy said coldly: "Good-morning. Yes, I am Laurie." Then with a stiff little bow went on up the stairs, leaving me with the feeling that I was suddenly congealed into ice.

That sensation was somewhat dispelled by the warm greeting which Mamie gave me as I entered the breakfast-room a moment later, but it returned again when the door opened to admit Laurie with the same boyish stateliness in his manner, and the same little stiff bow whenever I addressed him.

In vain I endeavored to draw him into conversation by introducing a boy's favorite topics, such as coasting, skating and other exciting pastimes. Mamie chattered like a little magpie, and beamed upon me from her seat by her father's empty place, while her brother, sitting next to me, ate his breakfast in almost utter silence. I tried my best to appear natural and at my ease, but that chill presence made me cold and quiet. I was too young, too easily affected by others to not care whether a boy of fifteen years approved of me or not. Perhaps if the boy had not been Laurie, it would have been different. But as it was, I was glad when the meal was at an end, and, after kissing Mamie, and with a cool "Good-morning" to me, he had left the room. It was with a still greater sense of relief that I saw a few moments later from my post at the library window a warmly-coated and capped young man go down the carriage drive with his school books under his arm.

Then Mamie and I were left to spend the long winter's day together. I said it was with a feeling of relief that I saw Laurie leave the house, and yet I missed him all that day. And when 4 o'clock came and with it his quick, boyish step in the hall, my heart gave a sudden start and I would gladly have echoed Mamie's glad cry of "Laurie's come!" But he only stayed long enough to warm and leave his books. Then taking his sled he started out to coast till supper time, leaving us only a little breeze of frosty air and a sense of loneliness as we drew nearer the glowing fire to wait for the evening train from the city, bearing its precious load of human freight, with my husband and Mamie's papa among the number.

So the days and weeks went by. Mamie and I grew to be inseparable. We were together from morning until night. I heard her lessons, read to her and sat with her while she practiced her music; while she in turn was my constant companion in my every-day duties and pleasures. But Laurie, oh, how many a heart-ache have I had over Laurie!

Laurie remained the same, gentlemanly, polite and respectful—perfectly so. At times I longed, fairly longed, to have him just the opposite, if with it he would be less cold and stately, and yet love me a little, and, after some burst of boyish passion, beg forgiveness in my arms as a little son, and receive full and free pardon, as from an own mother. But as it was there was nothing to be done; no way for me to reach his heart, for he had placed that broad barrier between us, and my hands could not tear it down. To others our deportment toward each other may have seemed somewhat cold, but perfectly just and right. And no one, I am sure, ever accused me of not being a true mother to Laurie, as well as to Mamie.

But no one knew how my own heart ached and grieved over the boy grown so dear to me, to whom I felt that I was a mere stranger, and no more.

Sometimes I despaired of ever winning his confidence and love. Sometimes a little thing would instill hope in my heart, and the burden would seem lighter for a day or two, only to grow the heavier when he again made me realize how far apart we were by some more than usual coldness.

Still I hoped and prayed. I could do nothing more. There was nothing needed for his comfort. Mrs. Wait, ever jealous of her boy, watched over him so carefully that he did not need even my faulty mother love and waiting hand to do for him the many little things which a boy is constantly exacting.

But the time came when even good Mrs. Wait failed him, and then I got my reward for patient waiting and praying. One day, one cold icy day, just at evening, I sat alone before the fire, putting a few last stitches in a Christmas present for Mamie, which I had to make at odd moments while she was away. Now she was spending the afternoon with a little friend, and would not be home for some time. Mrs. Wait had gone to the city to do some shopping, and would not get back until my husband came, so, except for the servants, I was alone. Laurie I had not seen since morning, when he took his skates, saying he was going to try the ice on the river before coming home.

The great house was still and lonely, even the French clock on the mantel had a more than unusual subdued sound as it tinkled out the hour of 5 with its silvery gong. I had just completed my work, and was holding up before me, a delicate mull-scarf which I had embroidered in pale blue forget-me-nots, admiring my own handwork and thinking with a little pleased smile of Mamie's delight when she would find it among her presents Christmas morning—for what does a little maiden of to-day admire so much as a dainty embroidered article of wearing apparel? When I was startled by a sudden peal of the door bell. I hastily put my work aside and rose from my chair as the door was thrown open and the maid appeared with a strangely scared look on her face as she exclaimed:

"Oh, ma'am Master Laurie is hurt dreadful, and they've just brought him home. Whatever shall we do? Mrs. Wait is gone. Oh dear! oh dear!" And she hurried away, wringing her hands in her distress, while I quivering from head to foot, but with great effort to control myself, hastened after her. I met the strange procession in the hall, Four boys of Laurie's age, carrying a lifeless figure between them, four grave young faces, but one a still white one a still one, across which tricked a stream of warm' red bolod; four merry voices hushed to silence in the midst of their boyish glee by the sudden mysterious shadow of calamity fallen upon one of their mates.

"What is it?" I asked in a breathless whisper, as I caught one of the cold, lifeless hands in my warm ones. "Tell me, what have you done to Laurie?"

And they told me in low, frightened tones, while I pulled out the broad sofa in the end of the hall for them to lay their precious burden on, and hurried one of the distressed servants off for the doctor, how they had all been skating on the river, and Laurie suddenly fell and struck his head against a sharp block of ice which had just been cut, and when they picked him up he was senseless, and the blood was rushing down his forehead from a great gash near his temple.

They carried him home as quickly as possible; the river was only a little distance away, and even the cruel skates were still fastened to the lifeless feet.

One of the boys stooped down and took them off as tenderly as a mother would the little shoes from her dead child's feet, while the rest looked on in mute sorrow.

I sent a maid for hot water and a sponge, and while waiting for the doctor washed the dark blood from the poor bruised head and face, feeling that now at least I was of some use to Laurie; and, strange to say, filled with anxious alarm as I was, the thought was sweet to me.

When the doctor came—it seemed hours, though in reality it was scarcely minutes—he ordered all away except myself, and while he examined the wound he bade me hold Laurie's head in both my hands. Oh, how I prayed, that the verdict might be favorable, as I bent over the still face and pressed a kiss on the blood-stained hair! And what a great overwhelming load rolled from my heart, when, the examination being over, he said with a low shake of the head:

"One-eight of an inch nearer the temple and he would have been beyond all human skill, but now we'll soon have him himself again."

As if in direct reply to the words, Laurie suddenly opened wide his eyes, then shut them again and bent his brows in pain, while a great tear rolled down his cheek. I quickly wiped it away with my handkerchief, when he again opened his handsome eyes and looked for a moment into my face, then closed them, with a little, weary sigh. The doctor in the meantime had prepared himself for the painful operation of sewing up the ugly gash in the side of the head, and, turning to me, said: "Where is Mrs. Wait? I need her badly."

I told him that she was in the city, and would not get back till Laurie's father came. He frowned slightly, and said: "Too bad! Is there any one in the house who could take her place, and hold Laurie's head while I go through this operation?" he continued in a voice, and motioning toward the long thread and sharp needle on the table.

"No one but myself," I replied, calmly.

"You!" he ejaculated; then as Laurie opened wide his eyes, and gazed apprehensively from one to the other, added: "Oh, yes, of course. I forgot, you seem so young."

I smiled slightly and drew the head between my hands closer to me, while my heart beat so I could feel it throb, and I trembled so I thought I should have to run away. But I brought all my courage to bear upon my fears, and thinking "Now is the time to make Laurie love you, for he needs you more than he ever has, or probably ever will again," I said: "I'll hold his head, doctor. If I'm young, I'm not a coward, and I can stand this much surely for one I love."

Quickly the downcast lids were raised and a little flush stole over the pale face between my hands, as the upturned eyes met mine smiling down into them, with love and sympathy mixed with help and courage in their depths. And when they were closed again two great tears stole down the cheeks, which I quietly wiped away, then pressing a kiss on

Laurie ver flinched, but once in a while a tear would steal from under the tightly closed eyelids and run down his cheek into my hand. And every now and then he would compress his lips as if to keep back some exclamation when the pain became unendurable.

When it was over and the doctor gone, I went back to the library, where we had moved the sofa with our patient on it, to get the work which I was afraid Mamie might find if left there.

Laurie lay as if asleep, with his face, pale still and drawn with pain, turned toward the fire, I stole quietly up to him, and stood looking at the patient face, which I loved almost as if he were my own, when he slowly opened his eyes, and seeing me, said, gravely:

"Did you mean what you said to the doctor?"

"What did I say?" I asked, with a smile.

"Why, that you could stand that much for one you love. Did you mean that you could hold my head and help me bear the pains because you loved me?" and he looked wonderingly up into my face.

"Yes," I replied, gently, "I did it, Laurie, dear, because I love you and because I want you to love me."

He drew in his breath with a little sob, then stretching his arms out to me, cried: "Oh, I never knew that you loved me. I do love you. Oh, surely I do! And I've been so hungry to have you love and pet me as you do Mamie!" And, as I clasped him close to my happy heart to let him cry his grief and pain away, he sobbed: "I've been such a naughty boy. Can you ever forgive me—mamma—dear?"

Then I knew truly that I had won Laurie, after all my hoping and praying. —Dorothy Boswick, in Chicago Standard.

What of the Dead?

All wish for happiness beyond this life. All hope to meet again the loved and lost. In every heart grows this sacred flower of eternal hope. Immortality is a word that hope through all the ages has been whispering to love. The miracle of thought we cannot understand. The mystery of death and hope we cannot comprehend. This chaos to the world has never been explained. The golden bridge of life from gloom emerges, and our shadow rests. Beyond this we do not know. Fate is speechless, destiny is dumb, and the secret of the future has never yet been told. We love; we wait; we hope. The more we love, the more we fear; upon the tenderest heart the deepest shadows fall. All paths, whether filled with thorns or flowers, end here. Here success and failure are the same. The rag of wretchedness and the purple robe of power lose difference and distinction in this democracy of death; character alone survives, goodness alone survives; love alone is immortal. But to these comes a time when the favored lips of life long for the cool, delicious kiss of death. Tired of the dust and glare of the day, they hear with joy the rustling garments of the night. What can we say of death? What can we say of the dead? Where they have gone reason cannot go, and from thence revelation has not come; but let us believe that over the cradle nature bends and smiles, and lovingly above the dead in benediction holds her outstretched hands.—R. G. Ingersoll.

A Vegetable Diet.

A vegetarian reports to the British Medical Journal the result of his year's experience without meat. At first he found the vegetables insipid, and had to use sauces and pickles to get them down. As soon as he became accustomed to the diet all condiments were put aside except a little salt. The desire for tobacco and alcohol left him spontaneously. Then all his digestive functions became regular, and he found himself wholly free from headaches and bilious attacks. After three months a troublesome rheumatism left him, and at the end of a year he had gained eight pounds in weight. He believes he can do more mental labor than before, and that all his senses are more acute. For breakfast he has brown bread, apples and coffee; dinner consists of two vegetables, brown bread, and pie or pudding; for tea he rejoices in bread and jam, with milk and water; and for supper, bread jam, cold pudding, and, as a luxury boiled onions. Eggs, milk, butter and cheese are used only in very small quantities. The dietist is a doctor, and his statement is drawing out many similar ones from medical men.

Those who deaden sensation and stupefy the patient to relieve suffering make a grave mistake. They proceed upon the false idea that it is legitimate to procure relief from pain by destroying physical sensibility. This method, carried to the last extremity, would kill the patient to end suffering. It is not presumed that Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound will raise the dead but it often does restore those who are given up as hopeless cases.

Things in General.

Liquor sellers in Maine are put to strange devices in order to conceal their contraband wares. On a recent police raid in that state, in one house the bottles were found in the well, tightly corked and with strings round their necks for convenience in raising. In another the bottles were under the cooking range in the ash-pit. One liquor-seller, a woman, had two flat bottles hooked to a belt which she wore under her overskirt, and another dealer concealed his under a trap-door beneath a pile of hay in a cock loft.

The famous Greeley farm in Cappaqua, Winchester county, N. Y., has been advertised to rent, and will, before long, be sold under the provisions of Mr. Greeley's will. Colonel Nicholas Smith, who occupied the farms until recently, has removed to Kentucky with his three children, and Miss Gabrielle Greeley, who, with these children, is heir to the property, is living in New York. The farm contains eighty acres, and has several buildings upon it, including Mr. Greeley's big stone barn. The old homestead, where "Busy Life" and the "History of the Rebellion" were written, was destroyed by fire.

Chinese labor is becoming a drug in the California market, notwithstanding the check on immigration. The Chinese are being discharged from the mines, and they fail to obtain employment when they flock to the cities. Recently the largest contractor on the Northern Pacific railroad said that he did not consider Chinese labor really cheap, and could employ Scandanavians with more profit. It is also said that the contractor who is building the western end of the Canadian Pacific has concluded to dispense with them and employ white men.

The American consul at Vienna gave a "sheet and pillow-case" party to celebrate his birth-day, to the no small amusement of the Viennese mind. Robed in sheets, with head covered with the pillow-case, and wearing masks, a "host of Americans" joined the consul at supper, where the center ornament was a cake supporting the traditional cherry-tree, so inseparably connected with Washington's boyish inability to tell a lie. The tree was finally felled (with a hatchet?) to symbolize the fate of its ancestor, and the cherries were solemnly distributed. Behold something truly American! must have been the comment of the onlookers.

Some one in France has followed up the recent statistics concerning wild beasts and snakes in India with further particulars: He says that as many as 20-000 deaths occur annually in India from snake bites, and that since 1870 from 15,000 to 20,000 persons have perished in this way. India possesses more deadly snakes than any other country. In 1880, 212,776 serpents of all kinds were destroyed, and rewards amounting in all to 14,663 rupees were paid to the destroyers. In 1881 wild beasts caused the death of 2,557 persons as against 2,810 in 1880, and the number of animals killed by them any year is enormous. Leopards are, he thinks the farmer's worst foes, and tigers rank next; but the wolves are but little less destructive. In 1881, 1557 tigers and 3,367 leopards were killed.

Bits of Italian Gossip.

"Talking of beauty," says the Rome correspondent of the London Globe, "the young Duchess Magliano, nee Bandini, married at sixteen, is the belle of Rome; a really triumphant young creature, with the figure of a nymph. Mrs. Astor, the wife of the new American Minister, only twenty-three, is so beautiful that when presented at court her majesty remained speechless with admiration. The youthful Mimi Lavaggi, a charming young Marchesina, is to be married next month to another of the rich Gaziolis, a brother of the Duke Magliano. The handsome Duchess Storia Cesarina, with her fine eyes will not attend that wedding, for a cruel fire at her palace burned all she possessed, even to her shoes. This fire, with the bull which escaped from the station and rushed down via Nazionale into the Corso, where it threw over the senator, Professor Pantaleoni, innocently going to visit a patient, and a pair of horses running away with a carriage on the suspension bridge of the Ripetta, knocking down a wall and injuring passers-by in the street, and the ridiculous duel of Prince Teano with Martell about a dispute arising at the Geographical society, of which the prince is president—Martell kneeling on the ground and declaring 'he would not fight'—have been the excitement of the season.

Mr. Charles Reade wrote one or two letters some time ago to a morning paper condemning the practice of nurses and mothers who discourage their children from using the left hand, and thus render it comparatively unserviceable. Nature, he maintained, has left extremities of the body; and but for the existence of a foolish prejudice in favor of the right hand, both limbs might be rendered equally useful Dr. Gaetan Delaunay has just communicated an interesting paper to the French Anthropological Society, in which he seeks to establish that right-handedness is not an acquired habit, but is a natural attribute characteristic of the superior races. Savage tribes, he states, and communities in an inferior state of civilization show a much larger proportion of left-handedness than highly civilized people do. The Annamites for instance, are noted as a left-handed people; and negroes, according to Harting, are equally developed on both sides of the body, the right and left extremities possessing exactly the same power and weight. Idiots and epilleptics again, offer a very large percentage of left-handed individuals; and there are more left-handed women than men. Infants, Dr. Delaunay says, are left-handed at first (Mr. Reade adduced this act in support of his theory); as they grow older they become both-handed, and eventually right-handed. In old age, however, there is a marked tendency to both-handedness again. His general conclusion is that in the evolution of the species there has been a steady tendency to the development of the right side of the body at the expense of the other, and that the examples of left-handedness still to be met with in the Superior races are mere "survivals."—St. James' Gazette.

An old laborer of Joliet, Ill., named William Hayes, who for thirty-two years has been saving up his small earnings, had accumulated $4,000, which his wife secreted in heir little house, being afraid to risk it in the banks. It was discovered recently that the money had been stolen.

THE LOVE OF A FATHER.

From the Chicago Tribune.

We were a minister's children, Jamie, 12, slight, straight as an arrow, with the peculiar golden light in the gray eyes that betokens hot temper and brilliant intellect, and masses of fine, black hair, pushed back from a high, white forehead. Bright, handsome Jamie, how I loved him, with an unquestioned devotion that had taught me early to yield my wishes and desires to his imperious will, and to shield him in all things, right, or wrong, from the severe judgments of our father. I look back now with a feeling of admiration for the homely little Dot, only 7, with her long, tawny braids and great eager eyes, so true to her boy hero.

Of course the familiar expression that ministers' children are worse than any other had oft been repeated before us, and as people expected us to be little heathens we tried hard not to disappoint any one. Lessons on the total depravity of ministers' children in general, and we two in particular, were as daily food to us. We knew that we were very bad, but we managed to be quite comfortable for such terrible sinners.

Among father's few worldly goods was a beautiful horse, fleet as the wind, and the pride of his heart. Jamie had often taken me with him to the pasture to to lead "Flighty" backward and forward. And on rare occasions, when we had gained permission to drive short distances for father, we had grown bold and lengthened our drive, always receiving punishment for our boldness, but counting it well worth a whipping to hold the reins and feel the air rush against our faces as Flighty sped down the street. One summer morning that shown out clear as crystal father spoke of the day as well fitted for shopping in Cleveland, a few miles distant, and as he spoke of train time to mother announced his intention of going by rail. Oh! the winks, and nods, and sly motions that told the story so plainly to me, and how helpful we grew; of their comfort how solicitous. At last, with terrible warning of wrath to be visited upon us if we ventured to disobey any of father's commands, we watched them aboard the train, and saw it sweep off down the track, with the fluttering pennons of smoke beckoning gayly to us. Racing back through the grassy lanes, tossing books and slates into a fence corner, with my pink sunbonnet on top of the pile, Jamie crowned my tawny braids with his sailor hat, and, calling me a jolly tar, helped me to pack our lunch. Before kind sister H.. who would come and get dinner, and mount guard over the parsonage, could reach there, we had packed our baskets, harnessed our beautiful Flighty to the carriage, and were off for a day in the woods. Oh! the dinner in the Old Maid's Kitchen, a cave to be found on the banks of the Cuyahoga river, famous now as the Switzerland of America. The long drive down the road that stretched away in the distance like a silver wire. The depths of cool living green, that lay like a shadow in a barren land. The moss, the violets, the new sounds we heard, the new visions we saw. The delicious coolness of the spring we discovered. The dreams we dreamed of the future. Oh! that summer day. As it waned we collected our treasures, and, unfastening Flighty from the tree where she had been made safe, we led her to the carriage, and depositing our burdens we drove gaily homeward. Runaways we were, but philosophers as well, for we put the fact of our awaiting punishment as far from our thought as possible. We expected to be whipped, but did not intend to suffer the sting twice, once in dreading and talking about it, and again in actual pain. As we sped along through the summer evening we decided that life was worth the living—"the game well worth the candle."

Did we feel a presentiment that our placid enjoyment of this delightful wickedness was soon to end, that we finished our otherwise quiet sort of disobedience by racing through the villiage streets, huzzaing like young Indians, and passing every team with a challenge to follow if they could. Flighty was a thoroughbred and perfectly trained. She kept her head beautifully, or my story might have another ending. As we drove up to the gate with a grand flourish the whistle of the train in the distance warned us that our hour of reckoning was close at hand. After tea I was invited to the study and questioned as to the day's wickedness. I answered respectfully, and after being reprimanded, was banished to my room. Soon after I heard father's heavy step in the hall and Jamie's light footfalls following. Leaning far out of my gable window, I watched them enter the barn. It was a glorious star-lit night, and the silvery whiteness of the moonlight wrapped the world in its spell. Once I thought I heard the pleading voice of my brother. I could hear no more, and slipping out into the hall, stole down-stairs and out to the barn. The lantern was hardly needed, for, both front and rear doors being open, the moonlight lay in great bars, white and translucent, giving wierd brilliance to the space of floor, and leaving the corners in shadow. Creeping through the rear door I stood motionless, watching with wondering eyes the scene painted on my memory as clearly as if years had not dimmed the fire of those luminous eyes, or bowed with weight of care the proud uplifted head. Father was standing where the light of the lantern, suspended from the beam above, fell full on the hair just tinged with gray and brought into relief the massive forehead and stern blue eye. His mouth was quivering strangely, and the hand that held the carriage-whip seemed shaking with irresolution. For the first time in my remembrance father hesitated to do what he considered his duty, and met the fearless glance of his only son with such yearning tenderness on his strong old face as I had never seen there.

"James, my son, do you remember my commands this morning?"

"Yes, sir."

"You remember the penalty of your disobedience?"

"Yes, sir."

"You know that you must suffer it, do you not?"

"Yes, sir."

"Take off your jacket and your vest."

Jamie obeyed, hung them on a peg, and came back to his position with a hard, sullen expression on his face that showed a spirit to be won, never compelled by blows. Perhaps father saw this, for his hand failed to fall in punishment and his great strong arm stole around the boy's shoulders and folded him closely to father's side.

"Jamie! Jamie! my lad, why do you grieve your old father so?"

If an angel had spoken we could not have been more awe-stricken. Father, who so seldom caressed, who was so severe, so stern—father crying! Jamie was crushed by his sort of thing and stammered his excuses, and when he felt the tears on his upturned face his heart melted. "O! pa, I didn't know you could feel so bad. Don't!"

"Boy, do you think I love to whip you? Don't you know every blow on your tender flesh makes a deeper, sorer mark on your father's heart? My son! my only son!"

His voice faltered and broke. I shall never forget the tenderness that thrilled every word as he talked.

"I cannot break my [illegible]; I told you if you disobeyed punishment must follow. Now, my boy, many a time with aching heart have I whipped you, and it seems to have had no lasting effect. I cannot whip you to-night; and I dare not break my word. Take this whip, sir!"

Jamie took the whip, and father quickly laid aside his worn black coat, then his vest, hanging them beside Jamie's; and turning his broad shoulders to the wondering lad, his voice rang like a clarion.

"James, some one must suffer. I can't whip you must whip me. Strike, sir!"

The boy stood as if turned to stone.

"Do you hear me, Jamie? Strike!"

White as death grew Jamie's face; his mouth twitched nervously. The whip fell to the floor, and with a cry that came right from his heart, Jamie went down on his knees.

"O, pa! you may kill me, but I never can strike you!"

How he begged for forgiveness, passionately pleading, "I can't, pa! Anything but that!"

What promises of future obedience. But father's will was iron. He would not break his word. He had said so many lashes, and they must be paid. Puzzled and stirred to the depths, what could he do?

"O, papa! I have been so wicked; I coaxed Jamie; truly, truly, I did! Whip me, papa, and let Jamie go."

Now if you think this was not an act of heroism, I am sorry for you; and then, perhaps your father was not a minister.

He lifted his forlorn little daughter from the floor, and, as no way out of the dilemma seemed to present itself, Jamie stood by in shame and humiliation, while father's hand fell in punishment on his little sister. Father carried me to my room in his arms, and when I felt his tears splash on my hair a new feeling of love that understands was born in my heart.

If Jamie had been writing this record of our long ago he would have closed with the announcement that never from that day did we venture to run away with Flighty, and as our eyes grew accustomed to see the love written in every line of father's face we grew to watch for the smile of approval, and weep over his displeasure.

But alas, I must add one more testimony to the weakness of my sex, and just whisper how early the next morning standing on the veranda, where the lilacs swung their fragrant clusters against the study window, I ventured to say, "Jamie, don't you almost wish, when pa's back was almost in front of you so, that you had just given him a couple of good cuts, he has given you so many?"

Jamie had no chance to reply, for the lilacs were held aside from the window, and father's voice called, "Daughter." Trembling little wretch, I need not have feared. Father was one of those rare men who have learned to "let well enough alone," and only kissed me with usual tenderness as he led me out to breakfast.

Mr. George Grosvenor Tarbell, formerly a member of the Boston firm of Tarbell, Dana & Co., has given $50,000 for the founding of a public library in the town of Lincoln, Mass., of which he is a native.

President. Lincoln's monument at Springfield, Ill., is taking its final shape slowly. The cavalry group was placed in position the other day. This group consists of two human figures and a horse, and represents a battle scene. The horse, from whose back the rider has just fallen, is represented as frantically uproaring.

Mr. Hayden, of Washington, is the inventer of an apparatus for burning petroleum as fuel, which is claimed to be the only one in the world that will perform the work for which it constructed. Some years ago a woman, Miss Amanda Jones, invented an apparatus for burning petroleum under steam boilers which has been continuously and successfully used in the oil regions.

A Philadelphia merchant was suspected of poisoning his wife, and though the coroner's jury acquitted him, the women of the neighborhood did not, They attended the funeral, and, as the widower, Rankin by name, came out to take a carriage, hissed him with great unanimity and vigor. Some suggested stoning him, but no violence was done. But for further punishment, it is proposed to boycot his store.

Henry Ward Beecher talked with a reporter yesterday concerning the invitation that he has received to rejoin the Congregational Association. "I suppose they thought I was a nice, clever fellow, and missed me," said Mr. Beecher, adding, "I have been an Evolutionist for the past twenty-five years. Therefore it can be seen that I did not leave the Congregational Association—which, by the way, is merely a ministerial club—because of any change of views My reasons were personal, and I am as much a Congregationalist as ever."

Mrs. Gresham, who, as the wife of the postmaster general, will enter Washington society next winter, is visiting in Louisville, Ky. The Commercial of that city, thus describes her: "Mrs. Gresham is low in stature, slender and well-proportioned. She has beautiful blonde hair, and peachy complexion, large hazel eyes, over-shadowed with long silken lashes. She wore a beautiful wine-colored silk dress, and a long string of pearls encircled her neck. She is about thirty-two years of age, and is what might be termed a model of feminine beauty."

The late George Dawson, of Albany, himself one of the most expert amateur fishermen of his time, wrote, just before his death: "General Arthur, now president of the United States, is also a well-known 'brother of the angle.' His love of the art is the outgrowth of his esthetic susceptibilities. Than General Arthur no man can pitch a tent more quickly, adorn a camp more tastefully, cast a fly more deftly, fight a salmon more artistically, or bring him to gaff more gracefully."

Lillie Darst, who has just died in Ohio, was a remarkable character. As a child she was one of the most promising of the high-school pupils in Circleville. After leaving school it was her lot to work for her living. She did not wish to teach. Her mind ran to writing and newspaper work. The position of editor and publisher of the Circleville Herald became vacant by the death of the proprietor. She took full charge of the journal, and made it one of the liveliest papers in the state. Pickaway County, of which Circleville is the county seat, is largely democratic; yet this energetic girl not only made her Republican paper profitable, but edited it so ably as to attract general attention through the state. Her party services were well appreciated, and after the election of the last legislature she was tendered the position of engrossing clerk of the senate.

The people of Elsworth, Kan., are preparing to set out 2,000 shade trees in their streets on Arbor day.

A Fantastic St. Louis Romance.

A St. Louis Post-Dispatch reporter gave rein to his imagination the other day and started out for a pleasant little excursion. Feeling the influence of the spring, however, his imagination soon took the bit in its mouth and bolted, and the reporter found himself struggling helplessly with the American College at Rome and a private yacht; with a lot of lords and ladies in England, and a elysian cave belonging to Jay Gould in St. Louis; with an execution in Alexandria, and a Catholic priest in New York. He was secured by heroic efforts at the end of two and three-quarter columns, and is reported to be doing as well as could be expected.

The result of his adventure was a story in brief as follows: James Chester, son of Sir Archibald, and a "dude" of the first water. Lady Alicia De Vere, sister to Aubrey De Vere, the poet, too lovely for anything. Young people engaged, of course. James goes off for a year's cruise in his yacht, after being kissed by the Lady Alicia and Dante Gabriel Rossetti in the Liverpool Docks. Incidentally he attends a wholesale execution in Alexandria at the invitation of his friend the Khedive, and buys off one of the criminals for $5,000. An English man-of-war comes in, and the captain gives James a copy of the Times, containing the somewhat extraordinary announcement that "His Grace the most Reverend Archbishop of York" had married in St. Paul's Cathedral "the Right Honorable William Lawrence Hyde, K. C. B., second son of the Earl of Clarendon, and Lady Alicia De Vere."

James fainted, and on recovering went to Rome, after which, having called on Cardinal Antonelli (who, the reader will be surprised to learn, lived in "the Palazza Borghesi"), he entered the American College. In three months he was graduated and was made professor of theology. After three years he came to this city and was assigned to St. Stephen's Church, in East Twenty-eighth st. Among his other duties he was chaplain to "the convent of the Visitation in Forty-second-st." and the "Hospital of the Alexian Brothers in Second ave." James (now Father Chester) is called to the Convent of the Visitation to see a dying nun, Sister Mary Dolores. "James Chester!" shrieks the nun. "Alicia De Vere!" yells the priest. Lady Alica dies and James, as usual, faints away. It is all a mistake. It was Lady Alicia's first cousin who married K. C. B. James goes crazy and retires to a gypsum cave belonging to Jay Gould, on the outskirts of St. Louis, where he died last week. In his will he left $5,000 to St. Stephen's church in this city, and $25,000 to the "Convent of the Visitation."

The cold and cheerless truth is that there never was any "Convent of the Visitation" in this city, no "Hospital of the Alexian Brothers," nor any Father Chester connected with St. Stephen's Church. Priests who were educated at the American College in Rome say that there was never any such man as James Chester in the college.

COMMERCIAL.

ST. PAUL.

WHEAT—The market was dull, and all there could be done was to make quotations. There were more offerings than there was buying. Some May was offered. The millers are using stored wheat, but fresh deals were limited. No. 1 hard, $1.11 bid, $1.12 asked; May, $1.14 asked; No. 2 hard, $1.07 @1.09; No. 2, $1.00@1.03. Sale: 1 car No. 1 hard, $1.11.

CORN—May deal dull, though steadily held for spot. There were no buyers, except at figures below the market. The grain, apparently, was not wanted. No. 2, 48c bid, 52c asked; May, 51c asked; new mixed, 48c asked.

OATS—The market was firm, though there were no active inquiries; stock moderate. There was some figuring to prepare for May deals, but the demand did not seem to be so active as on Friday and Saturday. Quotations: No. 2 mixed, 40c, 41c asked for spot and May; June 42c asked; year, 32c bid, 33c asked; No. 2 mixed, 39c bid; No. 2 white, 41c bid, 43c asked; No. 3 white, 40c bid.

BARLEY—While there was nothing done on 'change, there was a better feeling and better demand outside. Stocks are shorter here, and the brewers are now showing more demand, especially as receipts are light. Prices generally steady at 65c for No. 2; 55c for extra No. 3, and 45c for No. 3.

MILLSTUFFS—Ground feed, kiln-dried, $20 bid, $21 asked. Bran, sacked, $11 asked; Corn meal, coarse $19; bolted, $22.50@23; bulk; outgoing, $1.25@1.40 per 100 lbs. Linseed meal, $19 car lots; jobbing, $20 per ton. Nothing doing in coarse corn meal. Ground feed in moderate demand. Linseed meal firm.

SEEDS—Clover seed is very scarce and firm; on 'change $8.60 per bu. bid; general range of quotations $8.50@9. Timothy is in light supply, and quotable at $1.55@1.65 incoming. Flax seed is not quotable here. There is none coming in, the high prices in Chicago attracting to that market what little there is that might otherwise come to St. Paul. The St. Paul mill is shut down for want of seed supply, hence nothing is done in the seed. The supply all over the country seems to be light.

MINNEAPOLIS.

FLOUR—Orders still come in slowly and the tone of the market is not much better, prices remaining unchanged. Quotations are as follows: Patents, $6.75@7; straights, $5.75@6.10; clears, $5.25@5.50; low grades, $2.25@3.50.

MILLSTUFFS—Bran and shorts show weakness, though quotations are nominally unchanged. Other millstuffs unchanged and in light demand. Quotations are as follows: Bran, $9.25@9.50 per ton; shorts, $10.25@10.50; mixed feed, $18.50@20.50 per ton on track; $18.75@20.75 f. o. b., according to quality. Coarse corn meal is quoted at 50c@$1 per ton below mixed feed.

WHEAT—The market was stronger, bidders advancing ¼c over Saturday's offerings, with holders confident and not disposed to part with their grain, though some sales of No. 1 hard were made at $1.12. Almost any quantity could have been sold at that figure. Quotations are as follows: No. 1 hard, for spot, $1.12; No. 2 hard, for spot, $1.08; No. 1 hard, seller May, $1.12; No. 1 hard, seller June, $1.15; No. 1 hard, for last half May, $1.14; No. 1 Northern, $1.08½; No. 2 Northern, $1.03½; No. 1 regular, $1.03; No. 2, 98c. Millers' association quotations were: No. 1 hard, $1.11; No. 2 hard, $1.06; No 1 regular, $1.06; No. 2 regular, $1.01; No. 3 regular, 90c.

CORN—General inactivity still prevails, with no trading and nothing to gauge figures by. Quotations are nominally as follows: No. 2, seller May, 50c; seller June, 51c; seller August, 54c; condemned, 45@47c for spot.

OATS—Bids were freely made of 40c for No. 2 for spot, 41c being asked, with holders firm. Quotations: 41c, No. 2, for spot, 40c; No. 2, seller May, 40c; white, 51@42c; rejected, 37@39c.

HAY—Choice grades are scarce and in active demand at higher prices, while the market is glutted with poor stuff, for which there is no sale. Sales ranged at $9@11 for choice, with poor to fair lots quotable at $4@7.

MILWAUKEE MARKET.—Flour, in fair supply; demand light. Wheat, steady; No. 2 hard, $1.20; No. 2, $1.10¾; April, $1.10⅞; May, $1.11¼; June, $1.13⅛; July, $1.15⅝. Presidential Poetry for the Nursery.

The American Presidential line
Began in Seventeen Eighty-nine.
The roll was led by Washington,
Who served two terms, then Adams
Jefferson, Madison and Monroe
Enjoyed two terms each, although
John Quincy Adams had but one.
"Old Hickory" twice the honor won.
Van Buren was the next enrolled.

One term the office he controlled
Harrison died and left years four
For Tyler; Polk next the burden bore.
Zach. Taylor died in years scarce two,
And Fillmore filled the balance due.
The next for a full term was Pierce,
Buchanan has equal terms to verse.
Abr'am Lincoln, first republican,
Was shot as his second term began;
And Johnson ruled until came Grant,
Who had two terms, Hayes one, and scant
Four months had Garfield, who was killed,
And Arthur the vacant office filled

MISS GAIR.

BY FREDERICK HOWE MARION.

Egalite did not think Miss Gair handsome; but her face had beautiful expressions. He had come to Balsam Hill prepared to see a beauty. Everywhere he had heard of Miss Gair as perfection. He expected to find a woman of brilliant personal appearance and suave deportment. She was the half-sister of his friend, Fay Somers, and the hieress of Balsam hill.

He found her a quiet, fair, and gentle woman, with a breadth of white brow, an inexpressibly soft and brilliant smile, a musical voice, and a serious manner.

He looked at her as she gave him half an hour's tete-a-tete before dinner, and could not imagine her either flirting or receiving compliments. And yet Miss Gair had the reputation of breaking hearts by the score.

At dinner, she gave him a seat at her side. There were a half dozen other guests. There was a fountain jet at one end of the long marble dining-hall, and the scent of roses came in at the open French windows. There was a water lily in Miss Gair's dark hair, links of gold on her white wrists. How softly and musically she chatted with them all.

After dinner they went to the billiard hall. Miss Gair did not play, but she selected a cue for Egalie, wished him success, and then went away to a sofa, where a group of gentlemen instantly gathered around her. The sound of her occasional laugh distracted Egalite's attention. He played badly and lost the game willingly, so that it left him at liberty to seek her side again. He told himself that he was curious to see wherein her power lay. How was she prettier or sweeter than a hundred other fair women he had known?

He could swear that she was not, and yet he sat beside her more contented than he had been in five years.

Purity. He thought, for a moment, that that was the charm which held him. When he had heard her laugh, he thought it was the sweetness of her merriment. The next instant, as her glance wandered across the lawns and rested on the distant hills, he believed it to be a faint tinge of sadness which rested on her.

Whatever it was, it held him at her side for three weeks. He had not meant to stay so long. To be sure, the shooting was good, but it was little he had had of it.

The morning of his departure came, and as he stood upon the long vine shaded piazza, she came out for a few friendly words of parting. He retained her hand. Figuratively he threw himself at her feet and begged for hope.

She looked startled for a moment; then her face looked pale and constrained.

"I have made a mistake."

"You have."

Her voice was hard, strained, and unnatural.

"I beg your pardon."

"The carriage is waiting for Mr. Egalite."

The man departed. Egalite did not venture to touch Miss Gair's hand again. She had never looked so lovely or inaccessible. He raised his hat.

"Good-by, Miss Gair."

"Good-by, Mr. Egalite."

How frigid that was! How hard and cold she had been, he thought, when he was in the carriage. After all, had she no heart?

The next year he spent in Europe. He saw the Alps, St. Peters, the Seine, the Louvre. He ate Naples grapes and sent home wine from Bercy. He watched Parisian coquets and sketched Florence beauties, but he never saw one Miss Gair.

He came home at last. To be sure home seemed a little dull since there was no one to welcome him but an acid maiden sister, and Turk, his horse, but one must work to live.

There was news from Balsam Hill. Fay Summers had been killed by being from thrown a carriage. Miss Gair had lost her property and gone to live with an aunt in Vermont.

He was vexed to feel his cheek grow pale. Why should he shrink as if a lash had been laid across his heart? Was he still so weak as to love a woman who had scorned him?

All night his eyes were set wide open in the darkness. Now that he thought of her, poor, sad,—no longer merry and artistically beautiful, in silk and costly laces—he dared to call her "Madge," as he had heard others who loved her call her; and, as he pronounced the name, his heart melted over it. If he might see her once more he would try again.

And, thinking this, it came about that one September night found him among the green hills of Vermont. He was at an incommodius little inn, but near Madge Gair. His landlord said:

"Miss Mehitable Mathews lives in that brown house, with honeysuckles over it, that ye like the looks of so well. Charming young lady came there from Boston last spring—old lady's niece. Miss Gair. Know anybody of that name? Thought perhaps ye might, hailing from Boston."

The purple twilight was growing over the crimson maples as he drew rein at the brown, vine-clad, hill-side cottage. The old-fashioned garden sloped to the sun. Clumps of flox glimmered like snow in the shadows of the old yew trees which guarded the door way. A few late roses dropped their crimson clusters around the gate as he opened it.

There was a little stir among the lilacs and syringas. A graceful figure clad in gray, vines in the hands and surprise in the lovely eyes, faced him.

"Mr. Egalite, this is very kind. You have not forgotten me."

"Never for a moment. And have you not relented?"

"Relented?" she faltered.

He poured out his heart once more. She stopped him.

"Do you not know—have you not heard that I am poor——a beggar?"

"I have been told—yes. But that has nothing to do with my loving you."

"Nothing?"

"Nothing whatever."

"Then," sparkling beautifully with joy, "I will let myself love you."

"Madge!" he cried. He clasped her in his arms, bewildered by his sudden happiness. She laughed softly, then her eyes filled with tears as she gently stroked his face.

"Do you not think I am happy, too?"

"You? I hope so. But what is one heart, more or less, to you who have been offered so many? I have no one but you."

"And I have no one but you," she said, earnestly. "Dearest, listen to me. Did you ever think of the snares that beset the path of an heiress? A woman who has wealth is courted for her money. Many men have courted me for my riches, but, my love, no one ever sought me out in my poverty but you—you whom I loved from the first, but dared not trust, more than others. My reputed poverty, I should have said, for," smiling again. "I am not so poor, after all. The speculation which involved part of my wealth was not so great a success as was expected, neither was it so great a failure. I lost a few thousand from my hundred thousand; that was all. But report made me penniless, and my visit to my good aunt, in this old-fashioned neighborhood, confirmed the impression that I had lost all. But, my friend, when we are married I shall be proud of the master of Balsam Hill."

The problem of "whom Miss Gair would marry," which the fashionable world had speculated upon for several years, was solved a few weeks later.

MRS. LANGTRY'S INTERVIEW.

Her Impression of a Six Month's Tour, and What She Thinks of Journalists.

Washington Special.

Mrs. Langtry recently closed a successful engagement in this city of three nights and one matinee. A lady who was accorded an interview with her gives, in the Baltimore Sun the following as the result of her observations:

She was dressed in a short walking costume of dark-blue serge; vest of basque covered with rows of narrow gilt braid. Her waist was encircled by a girdle of satin ribbon looped in a bunchy bow in front. Her hat was a toque, matching the dress in color, and a short mask veil of beaded net held the fluffy bangs down close to her face. Her back hair was arranged in a loose knot, low down on her neck. Fine features, an exceedingly arch expression, but a very large mouth, make up her claim to beauty. There are many more beautiful women in this vicinity, but very few as stylish. Her hands are exceedingly pretty, and fairly glittering with diamonds and emeralds.

Presuming that the initial point of attack would be her impressions of America, she had the question almost answered before it was put. With a laughing nod she said: "I am in love with America. It is a country which grows on you. Oh! you would laugh if you could look back, as I can, to my terror of coming here at all. When the subject was first broached, and my tour here of six months spoken of, it seemed an eternity. I could not bear to think of it. Spending six months in a foreign land was out of the question. I consented, in tears, to think it over, and left England weeping torrents. It seems very ludicrous now, but I was entirely in earnest then. Now that six months are nearly gone, I scarcely know how time has flown, and my days and nights have been busily occupied. I am working hard, rehearsing new parts and improving on my old ones."

"You must have had some curious experiences?"

"Indeed, I have. Now, when I said I had not met many people, I did not mean to ignore newspaper folks. I certainly I have met them everywhere, and by all accounts they have seen me do a great many things that never entered into my brain at all. They have terribly misrepresented my actions, and do you know, I have grown quite pink with vexation trying to have a fact truthfully reported? They draw so terribly on their imagination that I am afraid of them."

And here Mrs. Langtry fell to moralizing. "I wonder why men are so mean. They say such cruel things, and I believe just to show their wives or sweethearts what superior beings they are any way; and if a woman chooses to put herself on a pinnacle, she must submit to be a target."

"Don't you think critics in this country give you their opinion with a refreshing freedom?"

"Indeed, they do; but I can't complain of my treatment. I have been criticised, though I long for the day when every personality will be forgotten, and worth as an artist alone judged. I find Americans must have truthful, artistic renditions. They think more here of talent than they do in England. There the principal qualification seems freshness, prettiness, and a certain amount of aptitude, too; but here your actresses, many of them have grown what would be considered quite passe in England; and yet that is forgotten in their glorious talent."

"Do you read criticisms in the daily papers now?"

"No; very rarely. I read a story this morning about my going to a New York hotel to beg Miss Langtry's pardon, and how I looked weary and haggard, with fearful eyes and dilapidated appearance generally, and I have laughed a good deal over it. I cannot remember any of the above sensations, only that I was sorry to part with the dear girl, and I might have cried over that."

"Do you propose remaining on the stage?"

"Yes; I hope to, for ten years, at least. I like the profession, and I want to succeed."

The Jersey Lily regretted that President Arthur was not in town.

"I am told he is very handsome, and I would so like to have met with him. Now, is he really so handsome?"

The answer is not given, but it is to be presumed that the lady was candid enough to admit that he is.

The Illegitimates of France.

In France widows are not allowed to remarry within 10 months after the death of the husband, and divorces are almost unknown. Indeed, the difficulties of a marriage in France are sufficient to deter one from many attempts in that direction, and besides the church frowns on divorces. Yet the number of illegitimate children born there is over fifty per cent. of the whole number born; Paris ranking next to Vienna in this respect, where the proportions is 57 per cent. These unfortunate infants are left to the tender mercies of the "baby farms" about Paris, where great numbers die for want of proper care and nourishment. So terrible a thing has this become, so great a slaughter of innocence occurs each year, that a bill is now before the assembly in regard to measures which the state shall adopt for the protection of its defenseless bairns.

A tidal wave of extraordinary character broke over the steamer Aquila on a recent passage from Weymouth across the English Channel. When about an hour out mountainous seas suddenly and with scarcely a hint of their coming smote the vessel, threw her on her beam-ends, swept her decks from stern to stern, flooded the cabins and engine-room, broke the bulwarks in several places, twisted off the iron rail of the bridge, rendered the pumps useless, smashed one paddle-box and every sky-light and then immediately subsided, leaving the sea perfectly calm. Not more than five minutes elapsed from the first sign to the last vestige of the tumult.

General Gleanings.

Commissioner Dudley promises to send up to the treasury department $10,000,000 worth of pension claims this month. This will leave $20,000,000 back on the sum he promised to expend during the present fiscal year. He proposes to run the payments up to $15,000,000 in May, so that $5,000,000 will remain for June. This plan is adopted to have it all put out by the agents before the end of the year.

A fresh Boston Transcript reporter was sent out among the fishermen to get "points" as to the season's prospects, &c. He returned late at night with a countenance highly illuminated with spring smiles and bringing the single piece of information that the reason why a fisherman carries a flat bottle with him is that he may wait for a bite with baited breath.

The foreign exports of fresh dressed beef from the United States for last month aggregated 12,675,042 pounds, against 7,345,290 pounds during March, 1882, an increase of 5,329,752 pounds. Nearly this entire product comes from the west, and, added to the dressed beef that is shipped to eastern cities for domestic consumption, the aggregate becomes simply enormous. It is no wonder that western dealers resent the efforts of the railroad syndicate to control this immense trade in their own interests and against those who have built it up to its present proportions.

There was a novel exportation at San Francisco lately. Two hundred sacks of orange peel, valued at $1000, were shipped to Havre. It was the first shipment of the kind from that port, and is the more singular because the orange peel consumed in this country is imported, and in large part is from Southern France. Orange peel is worth about eight cents a pound. Oranges are so plentiful in France, Spain and Italy, as well as in Florida and in the West Indies, that peel is stripped from the fruit in large quantities for bitters and marmalade, and the juice is used to make acids. It is estimated that 200,000 pounds of orange peel was imported into New York last week.

When the proposition was broached to locate the southern Illinois penitentiary at Chester it was asserted that that locality was one of the most unhealthy spots in the state, and that it was little less than dooming a man to death to confine him there. The report of that institution shows that the charges then made were not wide of the mark. The death rate for the last two years at Chester is a fraction over thirty to the 1,000, and at Joliet a little over fourteen. For the four years between 1878 and 1882 the number of cases of sickness from miasmatic and climatic causes at Chester were 961, and at Joliet 585, or taking the number of prisoners into account, about six times as many at Chester as at Joliet.

Women Doctors.

"Why," said Miss Chapman, of Pittsburg, "we don't differ from the sterner members of our profession in our methods of practice. We just prescribe for people and cure them as they do," with a significant nod toward a passing procession, following the result of some brother's practice. "I have been here over eight years and consider myself successful. The gentlemen of the profession could not be more courteous to their own sisters. I am a member of the Anatomical society of this city as well as the county and state Medical societies. I have held elective positions in all of them, which is, I think, an indication of pretty fair treatment, for a woman at least.

"I had a hard time getting a start, perhaps not harder than the ordinary beginners in this and other professions, but it was discouraging. College and the dissecting room are the worst features to be encountered. The first four nights I was in the dissecting room I cried. The gentleman laughed so much at our timidity. Then I heard one of them remark how becoming tears were to the profession, and I left them off. Ladies are not treated well in many institutions whose charters compel their admission. The faculty take that course to discourage their attendance, since many gentlemen will not attend what they call a feminine institution.

"Any lady with a good education and a mature mind, above feathers and lace, can succeed in the profession in this city if she perseveres. I prescribe sometimes for gentlemen, but my practice is largely among the ladies and children. Half of my practice is among poor people who cannot pay. Many physicians send patients to me whom they cannot treat from the fact that a proper diagnosis of the disease cannot be obtained. Woman can understand woman, and it often does a patient more good to talk to her of spring bonnets and wraps than is effected by the medicine."—Pittsburgh Dispatch.

Collecting Secret News.

Another of the peculiar occupations of Washington is one in which some of this same class of men are supposed to be engaged. This is the collection of secret news for brokers and speculators in Wall Street. If any action is about to be taken by any committee of congress or by the treasury department which is at all likely to affect the stock market, it is of great importance to brokers there to get an advance intimation of it, if possible. Men who have a large political acquaintanceship have facilities for dropping into the secrets of committees and departments which are not so likely to be enjoyed by other people; but as a rule the men employed for work of this kind are keen newspaper men who do not correspond with papers requiring all their time. Some of them have grown rich at this work and operations growing out of it, and keep up a connection with newspapers only in order to be able to call themselves correspondents. They keep Wall street well showered with "points," and if the news is of a nature requiring it to go to the public also, they usually manage, as one of them once testified before a congressional committee, to let the broker have it, "a little ahead." They work in unison with speculative congressmen, the number of whom is greater probably than the public supposes, and is apparently on the increase. Perhaps the way in which men of this latter class look upon their responsibilities as legislators can be illustrated by the response one of them is said to have made to a question by a newspaper correspondent not long ago as to the action of his committee on a measure which would probably affect a certain stock. "If you want to know for the newspapers, I won't tell you. If you want to know for yourself, I will. Well, you see, the committee will report the bill some day, but the idea has got around that we are going to do it, and the market has gone up on us. Now we're going to keep quiet for a while, and let the market settle down again so as to give the committee a chance!" But probably he was slandering the committee.—New York Tribune.

Lord Palmerston being asked when a man was in the "prime of life," immediately answered "79."

THE FARM.

Far in the soft warm West
There lies an orchard nest,
Where every spring the black caps come
And build themselves a downy home.

The apple boughs entwine,
And make a network fine,
Through which the morning vapors pass
That rise from of the dewey grass.

And when the spring warmth shoots
Along the apple roots,
The gnarled old boughs grow full of buds,
That gleam and leaf in multitudes.

And then, first cold and white,
Soon flashing with delight,
The blossom heads come out and blow,
And mimic sunset tinted snow.

GENTLEMANLY JOE.

That was the name by which he was known in the banking house of Ducat, Gulden & Ducat, or at least in that branch of it which did a thriving business in the great commercial city of Birchespool. It did not require more than five minutes' acquaintance, however, to inform the uninitiated that the apparently complimentary epithet was bestowed rather from a keen sense of humor on the part of his five fellow clerks, than on account of any exceptional claims to blue blood in the case of Mr. Joseph Smith himself. Even the casual customer, whose knowledge of Joe was limited to watching the self-satisfied smirk and enormous watch-guard at the other side of the shining mahogany desk, or admiring the emphasis with which he utilized his moistened thumb in overcoming the gregarious leaves of his ledger, must have been struck by the misappropriate epithet. To us, however, who had, so to say, sat at his feet and marvelled at the war of independence which he was carrying on against the Queen's English—a guerilla warfare consisting in attacks upon aspirates, and the cutting off of straggling g's—to us our fanciful sobriquet was a joke of the first water. If anything could have enhanced our enjoyment of it, it was the innocent gravity with which our companion accepted the doubtful title, and, after one feeble remonstrance, adopted it forever as his own prerogative and right.

The circumstances of that remonstrance deserve to be recorded. Before the arrival of Mr. Joseph Smith from the paternal training stables—his father was a successful sporting tout who had developed into a trainer—our office had been a particularly aristocratic one. Welstead, our senior clerk, was a fine, handsome young fellow of twenty-six, who came of a good Scotch strain, and was occasionally understood to make dark allusions concerning the extinct earldom of Stirling; Dullan and Mereby were Oxford men, well connected and well read; little Sparkins was the son of a high church clergyman, and I had some of the best blood of Wales in my veins. No wonder, then, that our dignity was hurt by the appearance of a loudly-dressed, scorbutic-looking youth, with horseshoe pin and a necktie suggestive of spectrum analysis, upon the very stool lately vacated by my old college friend Vernon Hawkins—most gentlemanly and quiet of mankind.

For a few days we contented ourselves with observing the habits and customs of the creature. There was an audacity about his vulgarity, and a happy unconsciousness of all offense, which fairly disarmed criticism. It was not until he began to address us as "old pals," and went the length of playing a small practical joke upon little Sparkins, that a spirit of resistance began to stir within our bosoms, and that Welstead, as usual, was pushed forward as our mouthpiece.

"You see, Smith," he remarked in his most languid tones, "you have been in our office a comparatively short period, and yet you have taught us many things which were new to us. There is a natural buoyancy about your character which points you out as one calculated to shine in the most select circles. Before your arrival we had never learned to designate ladies as 'fillies,' nor had we heard of the 'real gents' whom you mention as having frequented your father's establishment. Those things interest and please us. Allow us to show some small sense of the honor your society confers upon us, by christening you as 'Gentlemanly Joe,' excusing the liberty we take with your name in consideration of the alliteration."

A great part of this speech must have been lost upon Mr. Joseph, but never did elaborate sarcasm fall so utterly flat. Instead of being offended, as we had fondly hoped would be the case, he burst into an uproarious fit of laughter, and slapped his gaitered leg with the ebony ruler in token of delight. "Haw! haw!" he roared, writing about on the top of the high stool. "Whatever'll father say! Oh! law, to think of it! "Gentlemanly Jo"—eh? You're right, though; you're right, and not ashamed to own up neither. I said when I was comin' up, 'Father,' says I, 'I'll teach them a trick or two,' and I have, han't I? Of course we're all gents here, for clerks is mostly reckoned such, but it do make a difference when one has been brought in contact with the real thing. You can call me Gentleman Joe, an' pleasure, but not as meaning to imply that there is any in this room not such, though, maybe, not one of you has seen a titled hurl give your father one in the short ribs and holler out, 'You're a deep old scoundrel, Smith, and one as knows how many beans makes five!'"

Welstead's face at the idea of his gouty governor receiving such an attention at the hands of nobility was so ludicrous that we all burst into a roar of laughter, which ended the first and last attempt to take a rise out of our bucolic companion. It is true that his life was spent under a continual shower of small jokes and chaff, and that his new name superseded his old one, but there was a massive simplicity about the man, and a marvelous power of converting the most unpromising remarks into compliments, which rendered him a very disconcerting individual to attack. Allusions to his hat, necktie, or any other peculiarity of raiment were met by his eternal horse-laugh, and an earnest recommendation that we should allow him to send down to the country and procure fac similes for all and each of us; "You hain't got nothin' spicy in Birchespool," he would remark. "Lord, I know a place at 'ome where you can get your collars spotted over with fox's 'eads instead of bein' plain white, which is a poor color at the best." I think he imagined it was nothing but want of money which induced us to refuse to purchase these and other luxuries, and he was wont to throw out allusions as to "it's not costing us nothing," while he jingled the loose coins in his trouser pockets.

Town life did not improve Joseph. On the contrary, he deteriorated. During the first six months that he honored the office with his presence, he not only lost none of the traits which he had brought with him from his father's stables, but he grafted upon them everything which is objectionable in the city snob. The premonitory symptoms were a suspicious waxiness of the half-dozen hairs which adorned his upper lip, and the appearance of a large diamond ring with a greenish and vitreous hue. His next venture was an eye-glass; and he finally launched forth into a light ulster, decorated with a large black check, which gave him the appearance of being inside a cage, with his head projecting at one end and his feet at the other. "It's a proper thing for a gent to wear," he remarked. "When you see a get-up like this you know at a glance who's a cad and who ain't"—a sentiment which we all very cordially endorsed.

In spite of all these peculiarities we learned not only to tolerate the gentleman, but even to like him. Indeed, we hardly knew how strong this feeling was until he betook himself into the country on a fortnight's leave, carrying with him ulster, eye-glass, ring, and everything else which was calculated to impress the rustics and stamp him as the natural associate of the "titled hurl." He left quite a vacancy behind him. There was a dead level of equality about the five of us which deprived life of all its piquancy. Even Welstead, who had disliked him from the first, was fain to confess that he was good fun, and that he wished him back. After all, if his laugh was obtrusive, it was hearty, and his quaint, vulgar face had sincerity and good nature stamped upon every line of it. It was with unaffected pleasure that we heard a loud view-halloo in the street one morning just after the opening of the doors, and saw our friend swaggering in, more ugly, more dressy, and, if possible, more vulgar than before.

Newsome, our bank manager, was an excellent fellow, and on the best terms with all of us. As we were all single men, with a very limited circle of friends in Birchespool, he kindly gave us the run of his house, and it was seldom that a week passed without our enjoying a musical evening there, winding up with one of the choice little suppers for which Mrs. Newsome was celebrated. On these occasions, since distinctions would be invidious, Gentlemanly Joe used to be present in all his glory, with a very large white frilled shirt-front, and another vitreous fragment sparkling gloomily in the middle of it. This, with a watch-chain which reminded one of the chain cable of a schooner, was his sole attempt at ornamentation, for, as he used to say, "It ain't good form to show you're richer than your neighbors, even if you are. Too much like a Sheeny, don't you know?"

Joe was an endless source of amusement to Cissy Newsome, a mischievous, dark-eyed little brunette of eighteen, the sole child of the manager. We had all fallen in love with Cissy at one time or another, but had had to give up on finding that her heart was no longer her own to bestow. Charles Welstead had known her from childhood, and the affection of early youth had ripened into love on both sides. Never was there a more fondly attached couple, nor one to whom the path seemed to lie so smoothly, for old Welstead had been Newsome's personal friend, and Charles' prospects were of the brightest.

On these pleasant evenings which I have mentioned, it was great fun to see Joe darting into the drawing-room and endeavoring to secure a seat in the neighborhood of the young lady, with a profound disregard for any claims her parents might have upon his courtesy. If he attained the coveted position, he would lean back in his chair with what he imagined to be an air of easy gentility, and regale her with many anecdotes of horses and dogs, with occasional reminiscences of the "big nobs" who had professional relations with his father. On such occasions Miss Cissy would imitate him to his face in the most amusing way, looking all the time as demure as a little mouse, while Welstead leaned up against the piano, not quite sure whether to laugh or be angry. Even he usually broke down, however, when the two came to discuss "hetiquette," and Joe, in his character of gentleman, laid down his views as to when a "feller should raise 'is 'at," and when not. The argument was generally closed by a burst of laughter from all of us, in which Joseph would join, though protesting loudly that he was unable to see the joke.

It is a proverbially dangerous thing to play with edged tools. I have been sure whether Smith knew how matters stood between Welstead and the young lady. I am inclined to think that at first he did not. Perhaps, if some one had informed him of it then, he might have mastered his feeling, and much misery have been averted. It was clear to us young fellows who had gone through the same experience how things were tending, but we held our tongues rather than spoil what we considered a capital joke. Cissy may have seen it too, and given him a little mischievous encouragement—at least young ladies have the credit of not being blind in such cases. Certainly Smith pursued his hopeless suit with a vigor which astonished us. During business hours he lived a sort of day-dream, musing upon his perch like some cogitative fowl, and getting into endless trouble over his accounts, while every evening found him interfering with Welstead's tete-a-tete at the high corner house in Eldon street.

At last the crash came. There was no need to ask what had happened when little Joe slunk quietly into the office one morning with disheveled hair, melancholy face, and eyes bleared with the wakefulness of a restless night. We never learned the particulars of his dismissal. Suffice it that he was informed once and forever that a gap which there was no crossing lay between Miss Cissy Newsome and himself. He bore up bravely and tried to hug his sorrow to his heart, and hide it from the vulgar gaze of mankind, but he became an altered man. What had been a passing fancy with us had taken root in his very soul and grown there, so that he, who had hardly known when it was planted, was now unable to wrench it out. The ordeal he had gone through chastened him to a great extent from his vulgarity by toning down his natural spirits, and though he occasionally ventured a "Haw! haw!" it was painfully artificial, and a good deal more suggestive of a dirge than of merriment. The worst feature of his case was that every week increased the gloom which hung over him. We began to suspect that our estimate of his character had been a superficial one, and that there were depths in the little man's soul of whose existence we had been ignorant.

Four months had passed away. None of us had changed much during that time, with the exception of the Gentleman. We saw little of him except in office hours. Where he spent the rest of the day was a mystery. Once I met him late at night in the docks stumbling along among ring-bolts and chains, careless of the fact that a trip or slip might send him into eternity. Another time I saw a cloaked figure lurking in the shadow beside the house in Eldon street, which fled round the corner on my approach. His naturally unhealthy complexion had become so cadaverous that the sandy eyebrows and moustache stood out quite dark against it. His clothes hung loosely on his figure. The eye-glass was discarded. Even the once gorgeous ring seemed to have assumed a sombre and melancholy luster, as if in sympathy with the feelings of its owner. His manner had lost all its old audacity, and become timid and retiring. I doubt if any of his rustic acquaintances would have recognized their gaudy Joseph in the stumbling, unkept figure which haunted the counting-house of Ducat, Gulden & Ducat.

The termination of Welstead's engagement began to draw near. It had been arranged that after his marriage he was to be promoted to the management of another branch in a distant part of the country. This approaching break-up in our little circle drew us all closer together, and made us the more sorry that the general harmony should be destroyed by the unhappiness of one of our number. If we could have cheered him we would, but there was something in his look, for all his snobbishness, which forbade even sympathy on a subject so sacred. He endeavored to put on a careless manner when he joined us all in wishing Welstead good luck at midday on the Saturday preceding the Monday on which the wedding was to take place. We expected then that we should not see our fellow clerk again until he appeared in the character of bridegroom. How little did we guess the catastrophe which was impending!

I remember that Saturday evening well. It was in January, and a clear wintry sky, with a suspicion of an aurora in its northern quarter, spread over the great city. There was a slight frost in the air, and the ground clinked cheerily under foot. One of my fellow clerks—Dullan—and I had kept by little Smith all day, for there was a wild look about his eyes which made us think it might be unsafe to leave him to his own devices. We dined at a restaurant, and afterward dropped into a theater, where Joe's ghastly face in the stalls had a very depressing effect upon the pantomime. We were walking slowly homeward after supper, it being then between 12 and 1, when we saw a great crimson glow up in the heavens, such as aurora never threw, and a fire engine dashed past us with a whistle and a clang, the big-boned shaggy horses whirling it along at such a rate that we only caught a glimpse of a flash of lights and a cluster of bearded, helmeted heads suspended, as it were in the darkness.

I have always had a weakness for fires. There is something grand and ennobling in the irresistible sweep of a great volume of flame. I could moralize over a conflagration as Chateaubriand did over Niagara. Dullan is of the same bent of mind, and the Gentleman was ready to turn anywhere from his own thoughts. We all began running in the direction of the blaze.

At first we ran languidly, jogging along with many other people who were hurrying toward the same goal. Then, as we came into a quarter of the town which we knew well we almost involuntarily quickened our pace, until, tearing round a familiar corner at racing speed, we pulled up, and gazed silently into each other's pale faces. There, not a hundred yards from us, stood the high house of Eldon Street—the house under whose hospitable roof we had spent so many happy hours—with the red flames licking around the whole lower story, and spurting out of every chink and crevice, while a dense pall of smoke obscured the upper windows and the roof.

We dashed through the crowd together, and fought our way to the clear space on which the firemen were connecting their hose. As we reached them, a half-naked man, barefooted and disheveled, was pleading with the superintendent, clutching frantically at his arm, and pointing up to the dark clouds above him, already rent with jagged streaks of ascending flame.

"Too short!" he screamed, in a voice which we were horrified to recognize as that of Mr. Newsome. "It can't be—it mustn't be! There are more escapes than one. Oh, man, man, she is burning—choking—suffocating! Do something! Save her! My child—my beautiful child—the only one I have!"

In the agony of fear, he fell at the fireman's feet, and implored his assistance. I was paralyzed by the horror of the thing. The situation was apparent at a glance. There, seen dimly through the smoke, was Cissy Newsome's window, while beneath it, separated by a broad expanse of wall, was the head of the fire escape. It was too short by a good twelve feet. The whole lower story was one seething mass of fire, so that there seemed no possibility of approach from that direction. A horrible feeling of impotence came over me. There was no sign of movement at the young lady's window, though crawling trails of flame had climbed up to it and festooned it round with their red garlands. I remember hoping in my heart that she had been suffocated in her sleep, and had never awoke to the dreadful reality.

I have said that we were paralyzed for the moment. The spell was rapidly broken. "This way, lads!" cried a resolute voice, and Charlie Welstead broke in among us with a fireman's hatchet in his hand. We pushed after him as he rushed round to the rear of the house, where there was a door usually used by the servants. It was locked, but a couple of blows shattered it to pieces. We hurried up the stone kitchen stairs, with the plaster falling in strips all around us, and the flags so hot that they burned into the soles of our boots. At the head of the stairs there was a second door, thicker and stronger than the first, but nearly charred through by the fire.

"Don't do it, sir," cried a stalwart fireman, seizing him by the wrist; "there's flames on the other side of that door."

"Let me go!" roared Charley.

"We're dead men if you break it!"

"Let me go!"

"Drop it, sir; drop it.

There was a momentary struggle, and the axe clattered down upon the stone steps. It had hardly time to fall before some one caught it up. I could not see who for the dense blue smoke. A man dashed past the fireman, there was the crash of a parting lock, and a great lick of flame, like a hound unleashed shot out and enveloped us. I felt its hot sear as it coiled around my face, and I remember nothing more until I found myself leaning against the doorpost, breathing in the fresh sweet air of night, while Welstead, terribly burned, struggled furiously with the firemen who held him back to prevent him from reascending the staircase, which was now a solid sheet of fire.

"Hold back, sir!" I heard the honest fellow growl; "ain't one life thrown away enough? That little cove—him with the gaiters—the same that broke the door—he's gone. I seed him jump right slap into the middle of it. He won't never come back no more!"

Together we led Welstead round to the front once more, all three staggering like drunken men. The flames were higher than before, but the upper story and the roof still rose above them like a black island in a sea of fire. There was Miss Cissy's window dark and unopened, though the woodwork around it was in a glow. There was no sign of the flutter of a female dress. How terrible it was to stand and wait for the end, powerless to stretch out a saving hand. Poor Welstead leaned against me sobbing like a child. A ghastly longing came into my heart that I might see flames in that room, that I might know it to be all over, and the pain and trouble at an end. Then I heard the crash of glass falling outward, and I bent my head to avoid seeing the very thing that I had wished for; and then there broke upon my ear a shout from 10,000 voices, so wildly exultant and madly jubilant that I never hope to hear the like again.

Welstead and I looked up. Balanced upon the narrow ledge outside the window I had been watching there was standing a man, framed as it were in fire. His clothes were hanging around him as a few tattered charred rags, and his very hair was in a blaze. The draught caused by knocking out the window encouraged the flames, so that a lurid curtain hung behind him, while the ground was fully seventy feet below. Yet there, on the thin slip of stone with eternity on each side of him, stood Joe Smith, the uncouth and ungrammatical, tying two sheets together, while women sobbed below and men shouted, and every hand was raised to bless him. He staggered and disappeared so suddenly that we feared he had fallen, but he was back again in an instant, not alone this time, for the girl he had come to save was slung over his shoulder. The brave fellow seemed to have doubts of the strength of his impromptu rope, for he rested his own weight upon the nearly red-hot water-pipe during those twelve perilous feet supporting Miss Newsome by the arm which clutched the sheet. Slowly, very slowly they descended, but at last his feet touched the topmost rung of the escape. Was it a dream that I heard a voice high above me say, "Hall right, missy," before a burst of cheering rang out which drowned every other sound.

Miss Cissy, more frightened than hurt, was delivered over into her half-distracted father's care, while I helped to lift Gentleman Joe from the escape. He lay panting upon the ground, burned and scorched, his sporting coat tattered and charred, while, strangely enough, the prismatic necktie and horseshoe pin had escaped the general destruction, so as to present an absurd oasis amid the desert around. He lay without speaking or moving until Cissy Newsome was led past him on her way to a cab. Then he made a feeble gesture with his hand, which indicated that he wished to speak with her, and she stooped over him. No other ear but mine caught that whisper.

"Don't fret, miss," he said, "'cause it was the wrong hoss came in. He's a good feller—deal better than me—and did as much, but hadn't the luck."

A vulgar little speech, but Cissy's eyes got very moist as she listened, and I'm not sure that mine didn't, too.

The office was sadly reduced after that. With Welstead and the Gentleman on the sick list, there was only four of us at the desk, and the reaction from the excitement had left us anything but lively. I can remember only one remark ventured upon during that first day. The dreary scratching of pens had lasted unbroken for over an hour, when little Sparkins looked up from his ledger.

"I suppose you would call him a gentleman after all," he said.

"A very much better one than you will ever be," growled Dullan, and we relapsed into the scratching of pens.

I was present at the wedding of Charley Welstead and Cissy Newsome, when, after a long delay, it was finally celebrated. By the original arrangement I was to have figured as best man, but my post of honor was handed over to a certain very ugly young man whose appearance suggested the idea that he had spent the last few weeks in a mustard poultice. Unromantic as it may seem, this youth not only went through his duties with all the nonchalance in the world, but danced at the subsequent festivities with the greatest vigor and grace. It is commonly rumored that this activity of his, combined with sundry interesting anecdotes concerning horses and dogs, have so prevailed upon the heart of a susceptible young lady, that there is every probability of our having a repetition of the marriage ceremony. Should it be so, I trust that I may at last revert to my original position as best man.

Kate Kane's Case.

Kate Kane, the Milwaukee female lawyer, who was fined $50 by Judge Mallory for throwing a glass of water in his face in court, has been ordered back to jail without bail by Judge Hamilton of the circuit court. Miss Kane says:

The act of mine in throwing a glass of water into the face of Judge Mallory was not a mere freak of womanly impetuosity; it was done four hours after he had refused to assign me as counsel. In the meantime I had left the court room and returned. Other things will be exposed and exploded that the public is unaware of at present, which will change public opinion. This act was a culmination of three years of insults received in Judge Mallory's court which I have patiently submitted to. I have been ill-treated by the press, and have had no redress. As soon as I am able I intend to write a complete statement of my case for publication, and if the papers here refuse to publish it, will send it to the Eastern papers. I will never pay the fine if I have to go to jail for a year, or even ten years. I am as firm as a rock in this matter, and will fight till the last. There is more in it than a dash of water—there is a question of principle involved. I have nothing to say against Judge Hamilton; he did what he considered his duty. Of one thing I am certain. If he were trying the case on its merits, his decision would be in my favor. I have been morally convinced all along that it was Judge Mallory who was prosecuting this case and not Sheriff Bentley. I sent word last week to the sheriff that if he would drop all proceedings in this case, I would not hold him personally responsible for any damages that might accrue, and would sign a paper relieving him of all responsibility. His reply was that he would have to see Judge Mallory. It is the latter that is prosecuting the case. Why did not the district attorney manage the case instead of Williams, who is my bitterest enemy? He and Judge Mallory insulted me repeatedly during the past three years, in the most bitter language, and if I retorted was instantly reprimanded. There has been a regular effort on the part of Judge Mallory and a few guttersnipes hovering on the outskirts of the legal profession, and who have been necessary to Judge Mallory in his campaign work, to drive me out of the legal profession. I do not intend to be driven out. I do not care a snap of my finger for public opinion. If Christ was on earth again they would send him to the house of correction. I have been hounded and persecuted since I have been here, and have never injured a person. Williams is persecuting me in hopes of achieving notoriety.

Iowa Coal Mines.

State Mine Inspector Wilson has just submitted to the governor his report of his inspection of the coal mines of the State. He finds them nearly all in good sanitary condition, and the laws of the State complied with; also, a good degree of harmony between the miners and employers. The capacity of the mines is rapidly increasing, and they are now capable of turning out 8,000,000 tons a year. The inspector says that if there is a coal famine up North it will be the result of neglect, and not the inability of railroads to supply the demand. When snow comes and not a railroad wheel can turn, coal cannot be sent by telegraph. The mines of Keokuk, Mahaska, Jasper, Polk, Boone and Webster now have a capacity of 18,000 tons per day, which would give 18,000 families one ton each per day. There are 400 mines in operation. The operators have invested in mines and machinery $14,000,000, and employ 9,520 men.

HOME AND HOUSEHOLD.

The Good Housekeeper.

Among the many qualifications indispensable to the good housekeeper stands pre-eminent that of a good cook; because that, more than all else, affects the health and spirits of the entire family. A growing family is no small responsibility, as every mother's heart will own, and in order that the children may become strong and robust, their food should be as carefully selected and prepared as a doctor's prescription. It should be regularly served at stated hours, and placed on the table in an attractive form at all times, as outward appearance form no small part in the enjoyment of the meal. The viands served in each household are so various no rules can or should be given, except that in all cases simple, wholesome food is far preferable and really more palatable than the indigestible dainties so often placed on the table. Therefore, mothers should teach their daughters that great and truly beautiful accomplishment, the secret of being a cook. Order and cleanliness may well come on the housekeeping list, for they also have no small part to play in the harmony of the family and the enjoyment of the household. Every cupboard, pantry and drawer should be subject to a frequent cleansing and straightening up process, sufficient to keep them in perpetual order; otherwise, by a little neglect, the housekeeper will have her burdens doubled and her work sadly disarranged. Only by extreme care, where there is but one pair of hands at the helm, can the management of a household be sustained with comfort, allowing a few hours for rest and reading. In such a household everything should be done as simply as possible; no extra tucks on the pillow shams or cases, fewer ruffles to flute, tables painted to avoid scouring, etc. Ruffles, tucks and fancy work may look well, but not half as well as a happy, contented mother, whose face is not marked with lines of care and weariness. Little will the babies care how many tucks were in their tiny dresses, when they become men and women. Better a thousand fold will be the sight of a bright mother's face than one wearied and fretful, grown cross and morose, or, it may be, gone forever, with quiet, folded hands resting at last.

Too many women who have been bright, merry maidens, sink into dull, stupid, fault-finding wives and mothers. Why is it? Some may fancy because the duties are beyond their weak bodies. And so they are. Sometimes the husband is responsible in driving his business and work, and paying no heed to his wife's help and conveniences; but in a larger number of cases the wife herself is really at fault. In nearly every household the work can be cut down and simplified; that is, can be, if we but overcome some of the old housewives' notions in regard to work. If they would only realize that a house can be kept, and neatly and prettily, too, without such an immense load of quilts as required months, and even years, to accumulate. Cheap spreads that are easily washed, nice new comforts and blankets are far preferable—and what a gain for hours of reading, rest and improvement; and this is only one instance, there are many more.

Valuable Suggestions.

The following hints will be of value during that period known as spring house cleaning: Always keep one room where the family may be comfortable. Have plenty of nourishing food prepared before commencing. Let the bureaus, chests, trunks, closets, all be put in good order. Look everything over to see that there are no moths. It is an excellent plan to take all clothing, etc., out of doors, put on a line and give it a good beating. Always scatter plenty of camphor gum in the trunks and boxes, when repacking, as this is the simplest of remedies for moths. Now clean cellar, by removing all refuse, brushing out all boxes and barrels, sweeping thoroughly overhead, the sides, and under foot. Once a year cover the cellar with whitewash made yellow with copperas, wash windows, scrub the floors and wash the stairs; sprinkle the floors with copperas water. Replace barrels or rather put them in some part of the cellar, so that any moisture that may gather under them may dry out. Next clean and arrange attic, or store room. In each room begin with the closet, take down the pictures, wipe, clean and lay away, all ready to hang up again. Move out the furniture, take up the carpet, sweep and wash the floor. Wipe down the walls with a broom wrapped in a soft cloth; flannel is the best. Hard finished walls can be washed, and spots may be removed by washing with pumice stone. Clean the paint add windows, and while this is being done have the carpets thoroughly beaten.

The Why in Vegetable Cookery.

Why should beans never be put into cold water to soak, as is often recommended? Because all the nutritious portion of the bean is extracted by the process. They should be washed in warm water, then in cold, be tied loosely in a cloth, be put into boiling water, with a spoonful of dripping and a little salt in it, and be kept boiling for four hours. They are then excellent to serve with gravy, and not with melted butter. They serve as garnish around roast mutton or beef, and are excellent eating served whole or as a puree. To make the latter, when the beans are done throw them instantly into cold water, when the skins will slip off. Rub the beans through a colander, and mix a lump of butter with them. A little stock, or milk, or cream, is excellent mixed in.

Why should plenty of fast-boiling water be used in boiling vegetables, potatoes excepted? Because the greater the body of boiling water the greater the heat. If only a little water be used the whole affair soon cools, and the vegetables become tough, so much so that no length of time in boiling them will render them otherwise. Broccoli sprouts in April, if properly cooked by boiling them for eight minutes in boiling water, will be tender as marrow, but if not properly done, hours will not cook them.

Why should onions be always cut in round and very thin rings? Because the fibre is thus cut across, and in so cutting them, whether for frying or for making sauce, they are rendered very tender when cooked. With turnips and carrots it is just the same; neither of the three should be split or cut in any other way.

Why should parsley never be boiled with soda—only boiling water and salt? Because parsley, having no oil in it, would be spoiled with soda, and all flavor would be extracted. All parsley should be picked free from the stem, be put into plenty of boiling water with salt, and in summer be boiled only one minute, and in winter two minutes, and be strained and chopped on the back of a plate. If only a little water is used in boiling it, the water becomes brown, and the parsley tough and ill-flavored.

Why should vinegar for pickling with never be boiled? Because boiling takes all the strength from it. Whatever vegetables are to be pickled should first be made soft with boiling water strong with salt, and then be well drained and the vinegar poured over.

Why should two ounces of salt and a bit of washing soda always be put in the water to boil greens with? Because the salt crisps the greens and flavors them, and the soda extracts the oil, which is greatly injurious to the digestion.

Kalsomine and Whitewash.

Kalsomine for walls and ceilings is a wash made of whiting mixed with water and glue. It may be used white or tinted with dry colors. The wall should first be washed with a sponge and warm water, and any cracks should be filled with plaster paris before the kalsomine is applied. To prepare kalsomine dissolve a quarter of a pound of white glue in cold water, allowing it to stand over night. In the morning it may be heated gradually, until perfectly smooth. Mix eight pounds of whiting with hot water, add the glue, stirring altogether. Should this be quite thick, add warm water until it becomes about the consistency of cream. This [illegible] sine brush, a flat b[illegible]e. Should there be a[illegible]ces they should be paint[illegible] before the ceiling is kalsomined. Lime is a great purifier, and a coat of whitewash on cellar walls or any walls gives a clean, wholesome smell and look. Ordinarily whitewash is made by pouring hot water over quick-lime. Care should be taken to use plenty of hot water at first, so that the lime may become thoroughly slacked. Cold water may be added afterward to thin it if necessary. A little blueing put in will give a cleaner white. When used in the cellar it is sometimes a good plan to mix in a small quantity of copperas or cayenne pepper; these are said to keep vermin away. When the whitewash is intended for outside work the addition of tallow or grease is recommended in the proportion of a pound to a pailful of whitewash. In this case dilute with hot water.

All About the House.

Ammonia water, or a damp cloth dipped in whiting cleans paint nicely. Sapolio is also good. Cold tea is the best thing to clean varnished wood with, the tea and tea leaves saved from the table for several days and steeped will usually be sufficient. It removes spots, and gives a fresher, newer appearance than when soap and water are used. Bedsteads should be taken apart and washed with soap suds, and crevices washed with corrosive sublimate. Use a feather for this (and be careful that it is left where it cannot be used by mistake, as it is a rank poison). If this is done once or twice a year one will never be troubled with the bed insect. Of course, if the room is to be kalsomined, painted, or papered, it should be done before the carpet is put down. If the carpet needs freshening up after tacking down, sweep and then wipe with a flannel cloth, wrung out of warm water with ox gall in it, in the proportion of one quart of gall to three quarts of water. The improved appearance of the carpets will amply repay the trouble if this is done once in six weeks, as this rubbing raises the pile and freshens the colors.

A great deal of pains should be taken to clean all upholstered furniture; turn chairs, sofas, etc., down; beat thoroughly, using a brush made on purpose for cleaning around tufts and buttons. Rubbing dry with a cloth wrung from ox-gall and water in the above proportions, will wonderfully freshen up all worsted covering of upholstered furniture, and all stains can usually be removed with it or ammonia water.

If dust has lodged back of a glass over a picture, remove the glass and wipe carefully with a clean cloth, clean the glass, fasten into the frame again tightly. If gilt frames are varnished with Dammar when first put up, it will be no trouble to keep them clean by wiping off with a damp cloth.

Avoid washing furniture with alkaline soaps, as the effect of suds is to leave it blue and mouldy looking. Sponge it off hurriedly, rub dry at once with an oily cloth, and to leave a polish, use pumice stone and sweet oil, rubbing it well afterward with the ever useful chamois.

CHURCHES AND CLERGYMEN.

The Charges Against Rev. Heber Newton.

New York Correspondence: And so it has come to pass, after all. The bold and plain-spoken rector of All Souls' church is charged officially—as Sir Joseph Porter would say—with the crime or vice of heresy. I have told you on several occasions of Mr. R. Heber Newton's position toward his church and congregation, and toward public opinion. His position is, to say the least of it, a curious one, and one which, it is possible, his excellent and pious associates will find some trouble in dealing with. Look at his position for a moment. He is a devout and honest Christian who, in the course of thoughts and events, has reached certain conclusions. He has found, for example, that the word of God is in the Bible, though the Bible is not the word of God. That is to say, not to put too fine a point upon it, the Bible is a book which one must take with reverence and cum granum. It does not work well to accept the Bible as a final declaration of Christian principle. Here is the end of Mr. Newton's logic. In his sermon, preached last Sunday, Mr. Newton made what might be called an audacious statement to his congregation: "I have spoken to you of these things, and have asked you to believe them. But, to be frank with you now, I do not believe them." Mr. Newton, it must be clear, is one of those thinking men who, finding himself in a restricted place, with rigid orders of faith imposed upon him, has grown gradually and almost imperceptibly out of these ideas, and, perhaps in spite of himself, has given expression to his convictions. He has been disloyal to his ordination vows, there can be no question of that. But an honest man who persists in making inquiries, who persists in going to the bottom of his own faith and in adjusting this faith to the knowledge of his time, may be a reformer, not essentially a heretic. Mr. Newton is, technically, a heretic. But his heresy does not go far enough to make him dangerous. His heresy is that long-sightedness which sees beyond dark and narrow conservatism. It is a modification of old belief and knowledge. If his Episcopal associates, however, can not stand this, they will, naturally enough, put him out of their fold, and they can not be condemned for their action. But men of thought will condemn them for putting creed too obstinately before reason.

The charges of heresy were set forth in the presence of Bishop Potter, yesterday afternoon, by Dr. Samuel Buel, Rev. R. H. McKim and Dr. B. F. De Costa. A long and serious indictment against Mr. Newton was presented to the Bishop, who promised to give attention to it. Let me give you a synopsis of the charges which were made against Mr. Newton. He has, it seems, violated the seventh article of the constitution. He has held and taught publicly doctrines contrary to those held by the Protestant Episcopal church. He has, for instance, virtually denied the divinity of Christ and the incarnation of Christ by the Holy Ghost of the Virgin Mary. He has been guilty of acts which involve a breach of his ordination vows. He has represented the religion of the Jews as a polytheistic and idolatrous religion. He has represented falsely the mission and teaching of the Old Testament and prophets. He has represented Christianity as the outcome of natural historic evolution, and not as a direct revelation from God. In fine, he has, the indictment asserts, rejected the supernatural character of the Christian religion. He has also rejected the predicative character of prophecy, and has thus impeached the authority of Christ. The doctrines that Mr. Heber Newton has taken the liberty to preach are, in the judgment of the presenters of the indictment, destructive and un-Episcopal. They strike at the root of the Christian faith. They reduce Christianity to "a transient phrase of natural religion." Evolution is placed by these doctrines above Christianity.

Mr. Beecher on Heresy.

"Heber Newton was a good Christian," said Henry Ward Beecher on Sunday last in a sermon on liberty of thought and speech in the churches. "No one doubted this," he continued. "He was of a sweet and temperate spirit. He has carefully acquainted himself with all that has been taught with regard to the scriptures by the scholars of Europe and America. In his pastoral work he has made known his advanced views. He has been cited to answer for what? In his line of duty he has given expression to the views of ripe scholarship, and of what is he accused? Has he been untoward and rash? No, he is cited to answer for the violation of his ordination vows. How did it come that he had ordination vows imposed on him that deprived him of the divine liberty of speech and of thought? It was the church that was criminal. No organization has the right to exist that cannot hold in its bounds a man who gives proof that he is the Lord's in temper and all the elements of life. If individuals had love and charity, organized bodies had not. Dr. Thomas and Prof. Swing of Chicago were cast out, the one by the Methodists and the other by the Presbyterians, because they crossed denominational lines. Many pastors hold equally advanced views, but they dare not express them. They devote themselves to pastoral work and keep still. But here and there is a square man who cannot keep still. He speaks his mind, and, if it is done effectively, he disturbs the church. He does not desire to make a disturbance, and he only wants to preach from his conscience. But they say there will be trouble, and he must go. Then there are in every denomination a set of men who hound their brethren. They have a nose for heresy, and they lay it down on the track, thinking they are doing God's service. A hangman's work may be very good, but it is not very reputable, and still less would it be if he elected himself to do it. But men run around for a rope to run up heretics for the purity of the church. Another set of men have settled over the churches, until they have addled all their own eggs, and then they try to spoil those of others. They have the rarest talent in the world to rot eggs. They are always at heresy trials. But we are coming to the time when church organizations will get freedom and liberty. It will be resisted, but scholars are too many and public sentiment grows. Growing disbelief on one side will drive men together on the other, and light and love will shine on them more and more."

Man and Nature.

Principal Dawson is delivering an admirable course of lectures before the students of the Hartford Theological seminary. In the last, which treated of man's relation to nature, he said:

> We may regard man in respect to his anatomical relations, his physiological relations, psychological relations, and his higher spiritual nature. Anatomically, man presents the characteristics of the vertebrate mammal, but in a form peculiar to himself and giving him original distinction. Physiologically, man resembles other animals in the possession of the four great functions of nutrition, reproduction, locomotive power and sensation; yet the balance of the senses in man is such that, physiologically he excels other animals in many respects. Psychologically, by which is meant all that belongs to the animal soul as distinct from the higher power, man and the lower animals agree very nearly with another. Yet there are marked differences; on the whole, man is not very much superior in this respect. Spiritually or pneumatically, man is somewhat higher than all other animals, and this is the power that lies at the foundation of all those new departures that man makes, different from the other animals. The possession of these higher endowments by man proves that they must be also in the Creator, and hence man forms a connecting link between nature and the Creator. We can imagine an organism as much higher than man's as his is higher than the lower animals. We can even conclude that such an organism might be desirable, for man has higher spiritual endowments which are not satisfied by his present physical frame. This idea is realized to us in revelation. Angels are not disembodied spirits, but possess physical organisms higher than ours; they may be a link between us and the Creator. There is a better link than this, for we have the link of the Son of God. Even redemption, therefore, comes into the system of nature. When our natural science comes to be worked out a little more and a little better, it will be found that nature tells the same story as revelation, as far as it goes

The Usher.

All have met the rare individual who greets the visitor at the door with a smile and a warm grasp of the hand, and almost insensibly guides him into a seat with an air which plainly says: "There; you have the best seat in the house. I have saved it for you alone, and am glad you came, for it would otherwise have remained unoccupied." The church-goer feels at once at peace with himself, the minister, and the church, and his mind is thus prepared to listen to the appeals from the pulpit. Perhaps he may have dropped in from idle curiosity, with no desire to be benefited by the sermon; but the suave manner of the usher has brought about a different feeling and the visitor is induced to attend regularly, finally being a member. Diametrically opposed is the usher who meets one with a what! another one look, bustles his victim into a seat and leaves him, with a glance that seems to say: "Now don't wipe your feet on the cushions nor put lead nickles into the box." With this parting glance rankling in the breast of the church-goer, he is hardly in condition to derive much consolation and help from the exercises. Between these two extremes lie many varieties of ushers, including the languid young exquisite who, with a rose in his button-hole, condescendingly interrupts his conversation with a lady friend to stroll with the visitor into the nearest pew. Then there is the too familiar usher, always in a hurry and apparently always a little late, who canters up the aisle and chafes inwardly at any inability to keep up with the fast pace. Perhaps as vexatious as any is the absent minded individual, who forgets that this pew is reserved for an especial purpose, and with a deprecatory smile comes immediately after the opening prayer with a request that a seat four aisles distant be taken. Of course the worshiper, with all eyes suspiciously upon him, feels that he has committed a crime, and to him the remainder of the services are a mockery.

Pious Paragraphs.

A writer in the Golden Rule gives the following facts about the circulation of the religious papers of Boston: Of the Protestant papers the Congregationalist, which is the oldest, claims the largest circulation, 23,233. The Watchman, the next oldest, comes next with 17,000. Zion's Herald follows with 13,800. These last two papers represent, respectively, the Baptists and Methodists. The Christian Register, the chief organ of the Unitarians, has a circulation of 7,000, and the Christian Leader, the exponent of Universalism, has, presumably, 7,500. On the other hand, the Investigator, which is the mouthpiece of Atheism, claims 5,424, and the Banner of Light, the organ of the Spiritualists, claims 15,400, though it numbers but half the years of the Investigator. The Roman Catholics have but one distinctly denominational paper, the Pilot, but it claims a weekly circulation of 67,000 copies.

The Kalendar indulges in some caustic comments on the practice of religious papers to mix up religion and advertisements indiscriminately on the same page. "Is the day coming," it says, "when prayer books and hymnals will be issued interleaved with Lydia Pinkham, St. Jacob's Oil, and the Safe Kidney Cure? When ambitious advertisers will even decorate our churches at Christmas and Easter tide, for the privilege of getting their trade-mark in somewhere as a decoration? There is a sign of such a day in these Easter numbers of our leading church papers."

Revivals continue to be reported from various parts of France. Among the latest that in the Cevennes, called the Sinai of France, from the fact that the ancient Huguenots fled to this region of basaltic mountains, there to have the privilege of worshipping God as they pleased. The meetings are described as most enthusiastic, but the accessories—seats and meeting places—are most rude. The floors of stone, children and old people in the huge chimney corner, and the lamps veritably Roman.

A missionary from the Island of Peru, in the Samoan group, writes that there is not a heathen left. Missionary labors were commenced there only eleven years ago. During this time the whole island has been evangelized, churches, chapels, mission houses have been built at their own expense, and they are now supporting their own pastors and contributing to the society that sent them pastors and teachers.

A correspondent of The Advance says there are nearly 1,000 members of Protestant churches in Rome who are converts from Romanism. These represent a much larger Protestant population, and are the results of ten years of missionary labor.

There are 220,000 members of temperance societies in twenty Episcopal dioceses in England. Among 3,000 abstaining ministers are five bishops and seven of the queen's chaplains.

Mr. Moody says he does not fear infidelity half so much as he fears the cold formalism which is creeping over Christianity—the want of heart, interest, fire and enthusiasm.

A Mounted Policeman's Hardship.

Fort Macleod Gazette: Charles Parker, a member of the Northwest mounted police, stationed at Macleod, started from Stand Off for the St. Mary's river with dispatches during the late storm. After traveling some distance he became snow-blind and lost his way, and had been out five days and nights without anything to eat, when he was found by the stage driver en route to Macleod. The particulars, as given us by Mr. Hugh Monroe, a passenger on the coach, are much as follows: They found him sitting on his horse in an almost unconscious state, about eighteen miles this side of Milk river, on the Benton trail. He did not seem to care where he went or what became of him. They took him from his horse, but after he had sat still a few moments he could not move. When he saw a loaf of bread he thought he could eat ten of them, but was unable to touch a small piece of it. The horse showed himself almost human. He had no lariat to tie him with, but when he would lie down in the snow at night the horse would stand near him, occasionally coming up and licking his face, and in the morning he would come to him to be saddled. The horse kept going with him until he struck the trail, when he turned and followed it till he met the Macleod coach. Parker said that at one time he felt so desperate that if he had had a piece of paper and pencil to explain his action he would have shot himself. His first thought on returning to consciousness was his duty, wondering how he could get the dispatches which he had saved to their destination. Parker is from Toronto, and is a son of the auditor of the Credit Valley railway. He has had a pretty rough experience, and we are glad to record his miraculous escape from the very jaws of a terrible death. We understand that he is improving, and we trust that in a very short time he will have entirely recovered. Fortunately, the weather was not very cold or he would undoubtedly have perished, as he had on only light clothing and a felt hat. Parker was brought in from Whoop Up yesterday, and is now in the hospital under Dr. DeVeber's care, who will no doubt soon bring him round.

AGAIN THE AMENDMENT.

Comments of Iowa People on the Recent Decision of the Supreme Court Regarding Temperance—Cities Rapidly Catching on to the High License Plan—The New Railway Commissioner.

DES MOINES, Special Correspondence, May 3.—About all there is left of the amendment case is swearing at the court, Judge Day being the principal objective point. It is quite probable an effort will be made to lay him away at the forthcoming Republican State convention, but the Judge will make a fight all the same. He will make the issue fair and square, whether or not the party will sustain the constitution as interpreted by the highest tribunal in the State. If any change is made in the court it should be to improve its legal gratifications. But it is impossible to do this, for a man fitted for the place will not have it. He can make more money in practice. Said one of the ablest lawyers in the State when earnestly pressed to take a place on the bench, "I am not quite ready to retire to private life and die in the poor house. I want to make a little money." His income is five times the salary of a judge. A mediocre court will turn out mediocre opinions. No more can be expected until the State see fits to pay for brains according to their value. Iowa has had a supreme court which was to her credit, and an honor to the jurisprudence of the country. The opinions of that court are to be found in the recorded leading cases of the country. The members of the court which made them are now in private practice, earning large incomes. The present Supreme court is probably as good as can be got for the money. In this amendment case it so happens that individually every one of the court is in favor of the amendment, so that whatever may be said of them they must be credited with honesty of purpose. Judge Beck is being extolled as being the people's judge, and cases are cited to show that in several constitutional contests he has stood for them; and in one case the people changed the court to secure a favorable decision, just as is now proposed, but in that case Judge Beck was against the people. In 1869, in Hamon vs. Fernon, the court decided that townships, towns and cities could not vote tax aid to railroads. Judge Beck voted with the majority, and Judge Cole dissented. The court was changed. Judges Day and Miller came on the bench, and in Stewart vs. The Board of Supervisors, the court reversed itself and overruled the former case, holding that chap. 162, Laws of the Thirteenth General Assembly, was constitutional. Judge Beck dissented. Again the court followed this rule in Bonnifield vs. Bidwell, 32 Iowa, 149, Beck again dissenting. Since when this has been the law regarding railroad tax aid. The people wanted railroads in this State, and were willing to be taxed to help build them; but Judge Beck decided against them. A court constructed in accordance with public clamor, or the caprice of a dominant ism, is a very poor sort of court to build and establish the jurisprudence of a State. The people should first provide ample compensation to secure the best legal talent. When that is done the supreme court will become a credit to the State, and a bulwark of sound legal doctrine.

HIGH LICENSE.

There is a prevailing sentiment in this State for high license. Several important cities and towns have adopted the plan. Ottumwa and Atlantic have fixed the rate at $1,000; Creston $1,600, and Bedford $1,200. In this city the ordinance also provides that the sale of whisky shall work a revocation of the license. The saloon keepers object to that clause, and have resolved not to take a license at all, unless the city council will strike out the objectionable section. They are perfectly willing to take their chances under the State law for selling whisky, but if the penalty attaches under the city ordinances they will stand a good chance to get their license revoked. The mayor has given them three days to decide. It is a question whether or not the city council will back down, and yield to the dictation of the saloon keepers. The objectionable clause is really the saving clause in the ordinance to check or control the sale of whisky. With that revoked there would be free whisky, as it is next to impossible to convict a person of the sale of whisky under the State statute.

RAILROAD COMMISSIONER.

The governor has had a long tussel with the vacancy in the board of railroad commissioners. In his inaugural message he declared that the farmers ought to be represented on the board. At the first opportunity he confirmed his statement by appointing James Wilson. When Mr. Wilson resigned there was instantly great clamor for the place, and the politicians were also imperative. And for a time it was understood that Mr. Deering was to get the place, under the specious plea that he was a farmer, because he owned a farm, albeit he has been in political office nearly twenty years. Without questioning his qualification, the governor probably concluded that in these days when the supreme court is so supremely precise in its adhesion to the spirit and letter of the constitution, Mr. Deering was not a farmer according to the constitution, and two months ago laid his name aside. Since then he has been looking about, and finally narrowed his selection to two persons—Mr. Mott of Franklin county and L. S. Coffin of Webster county—which culminated in the choice.

Mr. Coffin was born in 1823, among the rock-bound hills of Wolfsboro, N. H. His life was passed on a farm, until twenty years of age, with none or very limited means of education. When twenty-three years old he went to Oberlin, Ohio, for the purpose, if possible, of securing an education. With a vigorous constitution, strong determination, economy and manual labor, he made good progress, and for two years was connected with the preparatory department of that school. Continued illness of his wife and wants of means compelled him to leave the school and seek other means to obtain a living, and the recovery of his wife's health. He went to Geauga county, Ohio, where he became a teacher in Geauga seminary, where the late President Garfield and Lucretia Randolph, afterward wife of Garfield, were his pupils, an event which he highly treasures in his memory, and which was not forgotten by the president and his wife. In 1854 he loaned a small sum of money to a man in Oberlin, who soon after broke up and skipped out. Mr. Coffin, incensed at the base ingratitude and rascality of the man, followed him and found him at Fort Dodge in the winter of 1854-5. While there he became so pleased with the country he determined to make it his future home, and the next fall made a pre-emption claim about three miles from Fort Dodge, and began life in Iowa. The next fall, 1856, prairie fire swept away his home, grain and other combustible property. During the summer of 1856 his family died, so that at the close of the year he was well nigh discouraged. The following spring he married an estimable woman in Western New York, brought her to Muscatine, and there borrowed money with which to buy an ox team and wagon, with which he and his wife traveled to Fort Dodge, making the trip in exactly three weeks. He put up another cabin, and in it lived seventeen years. By practical methods, intelligent direction, energy and enterprise, he has improved his surroundings until his home farm now embraces 640 acres. Latterly he has given much attention to fine stock breeding, and has a herd of 125 very fine animals. He is the president of the Iowa Fine Stock Breeders' association, which has developed such cattle as the Moninger herd, which swept the deck at the National Cattle show at Chicago. Religiously, Mr. Coffin was brought up in the faith of the Free-will Baptist denomination, and during the seventeen years of his farm life in Webster county, he has preached every Sunday to settlers in isolated communities where they were unable to hire a minister, after going ten to to forty-five miles, and for all this service the only compensation received was $5 on two funeral occasions. During the war he enlisted as a private in the Thirty-second Iowa, was soon promoted to orderly sergeant, then to quartermaster's sergeant, then to chaplain. As an agriculturist he is practical and progressive. No employe on his farm does harder work or so much of it as he. The first barbed wire used on his farm, for he early foresaw the coming fence, he hauled from Muscatine with his ox team sent after it in 1857. He is a man of good judgment, sound sense, whose only motive is to do exact justice to all persons. He is a representative farmer, and has given much attention to the transportation problem, which he considers very far from being solved. He believes firmly that the interests of the railroads and the farmers are mutual and largely identical—to harmonize these two interests, the proper work of the railroad commissioners. The governor has made a very wise selection, which will give general satisfaction among the farmers of the State, for he is not a politician, never having held a public office.

CROOKSTON, - MINNESOTA.

Missouri has a poor house terror which is said to rival that of Tewksbury in Massachusetts, and a general overhauling of similar institutions in the State is advocated.

The great trouble with all the schemes to worry England is the fact abundantly proven of the breaking out of a veritable epidemic of "informing." There has been inaugurated on the part of the conspirators in both countries a very general scramble to save their necks. The knowledge of this fact to say nothing of the uncertainty as to precisely who has informed and the extent of the revelations must act powerfully in deterring future operations.

Meteorolegists recognize three areas productive of cyclones: The largest, lying west of the Mississippi, embraces Iowa, Missouri, Kansas, and Nebraska The next in extent perhaps is that o Georgia, and the third New York Each of these areas is capable, "during the recovery of the atmospheric equilibrium," of generating a gyratory movement of the air which speedily develops into a cyclone of wide extent.

The outlook for winter wheat is a little better as the season advances but the yield will be far short of the crop of last year. The Ohio commissioner of Agriculture says that State is apparently worse off than any other State—"We are badly hurt, and there is no use in deny ing it. It is the first failure since 1875 and 1876, before we had began to raise 40,000,000 bushels and over. You can discredit any talk you may hear of over 25,000,000 bushels for Ohio this year."

The butter market, according to a Vermont paper, has never been so demoralized as it is this spring. Tons upon tons of old butter which cost an average of 33 cents per pound have been thrown on the market, recently, after being held all winter for high prices, and it is estimated that Boston dealers and shippers will lose from $500,000 to $750,000 on their purchases. Several thousand tubs of old butter are held by the farmers of Northern Vermont, and they are now glad to get ten cents a pound for what they refused thirty-five for last winter. The decrease in the demand for export, and a diminished call from the west, have been the principal reasons why the price did not advance as was expected.

It is believed that the number of immigrants this year will be 100,000 less than during 1882, owing to better times abroad and increased remuneration for labor. The immigration of the last few years must have relieved the overcrowded labor fields of the old world, to a much greater extent than is generally supposed. This relief, however is only temporary. The natural increase of population will soon place things as they were, and then immigration will come in again as the only security against starvation. The swarming population of Europe can only be kept alive by an open outlet for the surplus and average crops. A failure of either for a few seasons would make famine and starvation.

Mr. Sargent, United States minister to Germany, has given offense to the German government by a dispatch concerning the exclusion of American pork from that country. The dispatch was published with others by the state department some time ago, and the newspaper organ of Prince Bismarck is in great wrath about it, and intimates that our government may expect an official intimation that he is no longer agreeable to the court of Germany, and that his recall would oblige the emperor. Mr. Sargent intimates to his own government that retaliatory measures might be the only effective means of bringing the German government to reason, and that, while Americans would not force upon any people products injurious to health, we ought not to submit to an exclusion of our products under false pretenses.

The receipts into the national treasury for the month just closed were $26,164,510, and for the corresponding month of last year $34,463,580. The total decrease of revenues for April, 1883, compared with April of 1882, was $8,304,070 For the period of ten months ending April 30, there is a very striking decrease, compared with the same period for 1882. For the ten months of the fiscal year up to April 30, 1883, the receipts were $328,890,956. For the same period of last year the total was $333,230,801, a falling off of $4,640,045. The Washington authorities, as usual, are alarmed at the falling off, and fear that the treasury will run behind during the current months, and say that no more bond calls can be made during the fiscal year, and that the reduction of the public debt is probably practically stopped for the present. But the falling off will have to be much larger, than any yet reported to make serious inroads upon the vast surplus that has been pouring into the treasury for years, notwithstanding the reports from Washington.

Death in a Coal Mine.

New Glasgow Dispatch: While the men were coming up from work in the Vale mine the rope broke and the boxes ran down the slope, killing six men: J. R. Gillis, Colin Campbell, A. Fraser, Wallace McGilvray, J. McEachern, and William Hannahas. Those injured fatally were; A. McLeod, John Nichol, and Richard Taylor, A. Irving and Malcolm Beaton are likely to recover.

Deep Snow in the Black Hills.

Rapid City, Dak., Special: A most severe snow storm has been raging throughout this section since early Tuesday 1st. All telegraphic communication with Deadwood has been cut off. Fifteen inches of snow has fallen, and it still continues. Reports from other points show a similar condition. It is probable that a longer blockade to railroad and stage travel than last month will be the result.

Northern Pacific Bonds Sold.

The New York Commercial Bulletin of Monday says: The statement comes from Messrs. Drexel, Morgan & Co., that the syndicate that contracted in December, 1880, for $40,000,000 Northern Pacific 6 per cent. bonds, have within the past few days sold the remaining $10,000,000, thereby bringing to a successful issue the largest railway bond negotiation as yet consummated in this country. This secures the funds necessary to complete the trans-continental line in September next.

The price obtained for the $6,000,000 Northern Pacific general mortgage bonds, sold to the banker' syndicate, is said to be 95 per cent. A large block of them will go abroad.

Boston Excited by a Crank.

On Monday, in Boston, Mr. Wade, chief of district police in Pemberton square, was shot in the left arm and right shoulder by Richard Brennan, a crank recently discharged from the city correctional institution. Brennan was arrested. Wade's wounds are severe, but not dangerous. The excitement over the shooting was tremendous. Crowds gathered in front of newspaper offices, and nothing else is talked of. The wound in the arm is now worse and surgeons do not deem it prudent to attempt to extract the ball. There has been great loss of blood and the bullet lies dangerously near an artery in the elbow. Brennan was a member of the Thirteenth Massachusetts regiment, and is now on three months' leave of absence from the Soldiers' home at Togas Springs, Me,

New York Opium Dens.

On Monday the Catholic Young Men's association of New York had its monthly meeting and adopted resolutions denouncing the locality selected, No. 20 Mott street, in the very heart of the Chinese colony. The president said that one of the priests of the church was struck and grossly insulted by an abandoned girl last night. He called attention to the wholesale ruin of young girls by Chinamen in the neighborhood. The Rev. Father Barry said: "I know as a priest of this parish that in the neighborhood, of a hundred little girls have been ruined in the Mott street opium dens within a year. The girls are induced to visit the opium shops, and once in the dens are coaxed into trying a pipe or two of opium. The girls soon became victims of the opium habit, and then they become regular habitues of the house, and ruin is the natural result. Some of the incidents were horrible beyond description.

The Canadian Pacific a Big Thing.

President Stephen of the Canadian Pacific writes of the financial position of the company: "In closing, let me say that the Canadian Pacific company is officially committed to the statement that the whole of the main line from Montreal to the Pacific ocean, 2,940 miles, with some 450 miles of branches, complete and fully equipped, with the addition of about 17,000,000 acres of perhaps the finest wheat lands on the continent will be represented by $61,000,000 of share capital without preference of any kind. The proprietors of this share capital will own the whole of this property free of all incumberances, except about $5,500,000 mortgage bonds previously charged on the purchased lines. In other words, taking the $90,000,000 of share capital at the issue price of 60c, the actual cash cost of the 3,354 miles of railway and some 17,000,000 acres of land will be $54,000,000, say $16,300 per mile of railway with the valuable land assets in addition."

Parting Shot at Vanderbilt.

The New York Sun's Wall street article, speaking of Mr. Vanderbilt's departure, says: He is reported to have been in excellent spirits when he sailed on Saturday. No wonder. He has beaten everybody. He sold out more of his stocks and bought bonds. He has no Nickel Plate or Omaha stocks. But he has the bonds of these concerns. He did not sell a share of his interest in the Wagner cars, in the Merchants' Despatch, or in any of the soft things he owns. He peddled out, and peddled very adroitly, only what he considered to be worth little or nothing, leaving it to the d—d public to hold the bag, and after having accomplished that, he cynically remarks in his speech at the meeting of the directors of his roads, that he owed it as a duty to himself, to the creditors and to those upon whom the chief management would devolve, to retire from the presidency. All this is undoubtedly very smart, but is it honest, patriotic, civil?

Destitute Irish Emigrants for Minnesota.

Montreal Special: A genuine spectacle on an extensive scale of Irish destitution and miserable poverty was witnessed in Montreal recently by the arrival of 200 immigrants from Connemara, on route to St. Paul, Minn., with the intention of settling in that state. They were accompanied by a young priest, to whom they looked for counsel and assistance, as they were all in an impecunious condition. Their appearance was indeed miserable in the extreme. Each was poorly clad [illegible] without shoes. They were mostly in families, and seemed careworn and emaciated. Even the train hands were afraid to enter the cars until a hose was applied to wash out the interior. The party is an installment of those sent out by th[illegible] will take them c[illegible]ecuperate their wast[illegible] they can go to work vigoro[illegible]ds. Owing to their being for the States, the Canadian authorities did not provide them with food, as is done en route with their own immigrants.

Work on the Washington Monument.

Work has been lately resumed on the Washington monument, and before the season closes it is expected that 100 feet will be added to the shaft, which now towers about 320 feet in the air. Careful investigation shows that the massive foundation of the monument has borne out the prediction of the engineer in charge that it would not settle perceptibly, and no fears are entertained for the ultimate success of this projected highest work of art in the civilized world.

The New Land Officers.

The selection of Mr. B. N. Johnson, whose commission was signed by the president Friday as register at Fergus Falls, was made soon after Boyington, who was offered the place at the time Soren Listoe was removed, declined a permanent appointment. The following is a list of the new appointees at the various land offices mentioned:

Hon. C. G. Williams of Wisconsin, register at Watertown; E. C. Geary of Minnesota, receiver at Fargo; Joseph G. Chandler, receiver at Yankton; William H. Francis of New Jersey, receiver at Bismarck; James P. Luce, register at Deadwood; S. W. Duncan of Michigan, register; E. Hutchinson of Wisconsin, receiver at Aberdeen; George C. Armstrong of Illinois, register, and Robert Lowry, receiver at Huron; B. N. Johnson, Fergus Falls; A. W. Stone of Red Wing, register at Benson; Francis Atkinson of Indiana, register at Helena Montana, and Fred K. M. Joy of Ohio register at Bozeman.

Great Prosperity in Mexico.

The state department will publish in a few days the annual report of Consul General Strother, of Mexico. In it he says the republic is enjoying a degree of material prosperity heretofore unknown in her history. The successful initiation of the extensive system on railroad communication has given a stimulus to all branches of industry, the results of which it would be difficult to estimate. Mining is increasing to an extraordinary degree, both in extent and variety. The stimulus given to the agricultural interest has been equally notable. The culture of the cereals, corn, wheat and barley, has been greatly increased, as has been likewise the planting of sugar cane, cotton, tobacco and coffee. The increased demand for American agricultural implements and machinery is the natural result of this revival in agriculture throughout the country. Steps are being taken to introduce better breeds of cattle, horses, sheep and poultry. An extensive dealer in American arms and agricultural implements says that, while formerly he sold $100 worth of warlike arms and munitions to $10 of agricultural tools, the proportions are now reversed.

Extradition of Irish Suspects.

London Cable: At a meeting of the cabinet Lord Granville took the ground that the government was far from prepared to ask for the extradition, and said that the correspondence he had had with Washington, as well as the information he had derived from the American minister at London, convinced him that unless the government was better equipped with evidence the extradition, if requested, would be refused. He advised the withholding of the demand for extradition until the government's case was so strengthened by further evidence that when it was sent to Washington for reference to American counsel they would advise the demand. Earl Granville said that this evidence was forthcoming, and that Mr. Sackville West had been notified that it would be sent to him, and requested to submit the entire case then to American counsel, and if they advised it to thereupon ask the United States government to deliver up both Sheridan and Walsh for trial under English law upon the charge of conspiracy to murder.

A Dreadful Fate.

The steamer Grappler, plying between Puget Sound and Alaska, was burned on the 3d inst., and sixty lives are reported lost. The steamer burned four miles off Seymour Narrows. The fire being discovered, the engineer immediately reported to the captain. The 100 passengers, principally Chinamen, were all abed. Immediate search was made by the captain, who discovered fire back of the boiler connections. The engineer started the donkey and connected the hose. By this time the passengers were warned and the excitement was intense, the Chinamen behaved like maniacs, being utterly uncontrollable, and impeding the officers. The captain ordered all shot who refused to obey orders. Notwithstanding this, the Chinamen rushed backward and forward on the vessel until it was found necessary to knock some down and carry below others, ironed. All this time the fire was gaining, and efforts to control it were entirely unavailing. The captain ordered Pilot Franklin to head the steamer for the Vancouver shore and beach her. As soon as the sands were struck boats were lowered, but the excitement was so great that the Chinamen jumped into the boats and swamped them, and, owing to the blinding smoke, those who could swim did not know which way to strike out, and, being surrounded by a mass of struggling Chinamen, were drowned.

A Minnesota Man Shadowed by British Detectives.

New York Special: John Devoy, of the Irish Nation, said recently that it appeared at one time that every Irishman out of employment in New York had the impression that he could make $20 or $25 by coming to the British consul's office and making a statement regarding some Irish conspiracy.

"I have personal knowledge of the fact," said he, "that Mr. Edwards has been fooled by men who knew nothing whatever of Irish revolutionary movements. There was one instance where a well-known Irishman of St. Paul, Minn., who keeps a store there, recently had occasion to come to New York on business. He stopped over in Chicago, remained a few days in this city, went on to Boston, came back to New York, and then returned home. As soon as he started from St. Paul a detective there notified the consul here that this gentleman was about to start to Ireland with a cargo of arms. The fact that he got his beard clipped in Chicago and his hair cut in New York seemed to give color to the report that he was disguising himself. The hotels he staid at were watched, and a large corps of detectives followed his every movement, under the impression that he had charge of a large consignment of arms for the south of Ireland. As a matter of fact, this man never saw a single member of the revolutionary party. Many of Mr. Edwards' detectives have come to the revolutionists and offered to sell the consul. They said he was ready to swallow any story. Some of the papers that passed between informers and the consul are now in the hands of the revolutionists, and afford proof of English interference with the private rights of American citizens."

IRISH LEADERS WANTED.

Sheridan, Walsh and "Number One" Tynan Indicted by the Dublin Grand Jury.—A Sensation Caused by an Expected Demand from Britain for Their Extradition.

A Dublin dispatch of the 3d says: The grand jury has returned true bills against Peter Tynan (number one), John Walsh and P. J. Sheridan, and a bill as accessory to the murder after the fact against Fitz Harris. Walsh and Sheridan are in America and Tynan is supposed to to be there also. It is understood that the government will demand their extradition from America.

The London Times says: If a demand for the extradition of Tynan, Walsh and Sheridan be made, it will be based, not on the charge of general conspiracy, which must be held a mere political aspect, but on specific criminal accusation.

A Washington dispatch says: No communication has been received by the British legation in this city from the home government with regard to the extradition of any of the Irishmen now in the United States who have been recently accused of crime in Great Britain.

A great deal of interest is manifested as to the result of the expected demand for the extradition of the Irish conspirators indicted in Dublin to-day, and suspected to be in this country. The twenty-seventh article of the Jay treaty of 1794, reads as follows:

It is further agreed that her majesty and the United States, on mutual requisitions by them respectively; or by their respective ministers or officers authorized to make the same, will deliver up to justice all persons who being charged with murder or forgery committed within the jurisdiction of either, shall seek an asylum within any of the countries of the other, provided that this shall only be done on such evidence of criminality as, according to the laws of the place where the fugitive or person so charged shall be found, would justify his apprehension and commitment for trial, if the offence had there been committed. The expense of such apprehension and delivery shall be borne and defrayed by those who make the requisition and receive the fugitive.

It is clear, under this treaty, which has never been modified, except to be extended with reference to extradition, that our government will be obliged to surrender the men if found, provided a prima facie case is made against them.

Patrick J. Sheridan since coming to America has been employed in the office of the Irish World. He has heretofore claimed to have been in France at the time of the murders. In an interview this evening, he said:

I am not greatly alarmed about the indictment. I see no reason for apprehension. I stand here coolly and fearlessly awaiting the result of their worst efforts.

He declined to state where he was at the time of the murders, saying when he was placed on trial he would answer that question.

John Walsh also in New York, says, I am, of course, not guilty of any connection with the Phœnix park tragedy. The investigation at Paris proved that conclusively. I thought when I came to this country that I would be secure. I would not care at all if they would only bring the informers over to this country and try me here, with an American judge and jury, but the mere fact of my being tried in Dublin will convict me, as they have a happy faculty of convicting anybody there that they want to. I can procure most convincing evidence that I was in a small village in England at the time of the Dublin tragedy. I do not know what the American government may do in the matter.

HOMESTEADS.

Decision Concerning Homestead Commutations—New Facts About Homestead Entries.

The commissioner of the general land office has sent a letter to the register and receiver at St. Cloud, Minn., regarding homestead commutations. The commissioner holds that under the rulings and practice of the office, in accordance with the third section of the act of May 14, 1880, a person duly qualified to make a homestead entry, who has settled upon a tract of land legally subject to homestead entry, with the intention to acquire title to the same under homestead law, and who has resided upon and cultivated the same for the period of six months, may make his homestead entry and give notice of his intention to make commutation proof under Sec. 1301 of the Revised Statues, on the same day, or he may give notice of his intention to make the entry and the commutation proof in advance; and after the notice shall have been posted and published in the manner and for the period prescribed by act of March 3, 1879, he may legally make the homestead entry and the commutation on the same day.

The commissioner of the general land office has sent to the land officers of Crookston, Minn., a letter in which he holds that the five years allowed in a homestead entry dates from entry and not from the commencement of personal residence on the land entered. This decision was rendered on the appeal of Barney Phillips, from a decision of the land officers rejecting [illegible] proof of Phillips in a homestead entry. [illegible] 6, 1877, established an actual residence thereon in the land March 15, 1878, and had continuously resided there until Jan. 14, 1883, a period of [illegible] five years, two months and eight days from date of [illegible] final proof upon final proof, [illegible] "Rejected for the reason that the [illegible] claimant of five years." Phillips appealed from this decision on the ground that the [illegible] "is contrary to law and rulings of the general land office," and urges that, inasmuch as his residence was established on the land within six months from the date of entry, he was not in default, and his time of residence counts from the time he filed his homestead entry. The commissioner says: "Your action in rejecting the final proof was correct, and the exceptions thereto by Phillips are well taken, and are hereby sustained. The proof is satisfactory, and you will issue final receipt and certificate in the case."

State Board of Charities.

The Minnesota board of State charities and corrections, created by act of the legislature at the last session, held its first meeting in the governor's room at the capitol on Wednesday 2nd inst. All the members were present, namely: Gov. Hubbard, president ex-officio, Hon. Reuben Reynolds of Crockston, H. R. Wells, of Preston, Hon. Charles H. Berry of Winona, William A. Campbell of Litchfield, Rev. Dr. M. McG. Dana of St. Paul and Judge A. H. Young of Minneapolis. The board elected Dr. Dana temporary secretary, but took no steps toward permanent organization. The future duties of the board were discussed at length in an informal way and Judge Young and the Rev. Mr. Dana were appointed a committee to report a general plan of operations to guide the board in its work. An adjournment was taken to May 22. One of the committee rooms in the capitol will be assigned to the board for its office and place of meeting.

GOING TO THE GALLOWS.

Delaney and Caffrey, of the Phœnix Park Band, Plead Guilty And Are Sentenced to Swing.

DUBLIN, May 2.—Patrick Delaney and Thomas Caffrey, two more of the men charged with participation in the murder of Cavendish and Burke, were arraigned for trial this morning. They created a sensation by pleading guilty. Both were sentenced to be hanged June 2. Before Caffrey had pleaded guilty he was informed by his solicitors that the crown gave no hope of mitigation of the sentence of death, which would be passed upon him. When Delaney was called upon to plead he said:

I am guilty of being in the park at the time Lord Frederick Cavendish and Mr. Burke were killed:

The judge explained to him that this really amounted to a plea of innocence. Delaney formally pleaded guilty he said:

I was brought into this act at first foolishly, not knowing what it was. I was forced from work to go to the park. We had to obey orders of the secretary or take the consequences. When I got into the park I could not get away. I saw the murders committed, but took no part in them. I went to the park in Kavanaugh's car. He speaks the truth; so does Carey. The murders were committed by Joseph Brady and Timothy Kelly and by nobody else. I saved Judge Lawson's life at the risk of my own. I was put up to shoot him by Mullet and Brady, and the only way to escape the task was by calling the guard's attention.

Judge O'Brien, in passing sentence on Delaney, said he had a duty to perform. He had at the previous trial of the prisoner for attempting to shoot Judge Lawson, pitied him because he showed some feeling for his wife and family. The prisoner would see to what misery they had been brought by the wicked system of conspiracy.

When Caffrey was placed in the dock, the consequence of his pleading guilty was again fully explained to him in open court, but he persists in his plea. On being asked whether he had anything to say why sentence should not be passed on him, Caffrey replied in a loud, clear voice:

All I have got to say, standing on the brink of the grave, is that I did not know what was going to happen until twenty minutes before the murders were committed. I was bound to go [illegible]

The judge in passing sentences said there could be no doubt of the guilt of the prisoner's statement. [illegible] that it was necessarily wholly untrue.

Another Bonanza Senator in a Bad Scrape.

A complaint was filed in the First Judicial district of Nevada, last Wednesday, by Theresa Fair against James G. Fair; cause of action, adultery on the defendant. The plaintiff states she was married to defendant in Calaveras county, California, in December, 1862; came to Nevada with him in 1866; has lived with him until a few months ago. [illegible] she became cognizant of certain acts of infidelity on the part of the defendant, since which time she has not lived with him. The complaint says the defendant has been guilty [illegible] a dozen persons named. The plaintiff says the defendant has possession and control of a large amount of community property, the particulars which she cannot state. Mrs. Fair prays judgment as follows:

First—That divorce be granted her and that she be awarded the custody of her children.

Second—That such portion of the community property be allowed and set apart as shall be equitable and just. The affair created quite a sensation in Virginia on account of the high standing in society of both parties and the great wealth of Fair, who is also a representative of Nevada in the United States senate. The prevailing opinion on the Comstock is that the Nevada statesman will not make a defense in the suit, but allow it to go by default, agreeing to such settlement of property as may be determined upon by the counsel. Gossips also say that the amount has been agreed upon as follows: $3,000,000 cash; $1,500,000 real estate, at all events in case of divorce being granted; but this is merely rumor.

FOUR-LEAVED CLOVER.

Lola Maurice stood shivering and disconsolate at the window of the poor little sitting-room looking out at the passers-by on Clinton street, who found it hard to keep their footing upon the smooth, icy sidewalks. Two stunted, fir trees in the front yard glittered in their coat of ice and sleet, as if hung with diamond pendants; fair pictures by the artist, Jack Frost, were traced everywhere.

Lola Maurice, this drear, dark winter day, knew not where to look for bread for her mother and self. The coal was low, the flour barrel empty, and she had used the last bit of butter for her mother's dry toast, and there was no money to get more.

Only yesterday Levering & Bro. had given her a warning that her services were no longer needed at their trade palace, and real poverty stared her in the face. For herself she did not care, but her nervous, delicate mother was so ill fitted to endure hardships; how could she tell of her discharge, and their empty larder.

"Why, Lola, you have let the room get so chilly—and what a poor breakfast!" said a fretful looking individual of 40 years of age, who entered the room wrapped in a scarlet shawl.

The tears came into Lola's brown eyes as she gently answered her mother's complainings and told her of her troubles.

"Oh, Lola," moaned the lady, "what will become of us? And only think—this time last winter we were at one of the best hotels in New Orleans. If your poor father had only lived, we should not now be so poor." And Mrs. Maurice went back to the little dark bedroom, with headache.

Lola did indeed remember that winter at New Orleans. One year ago to-day her grave, handsome father kissed her good morning, bade black mammy not to allow any one to disturb the late slumber of his delicate, fanciful wife; in less than hour he was brought back, the brown eyes closed, the heart still d; the loving father was forever at rest.

Lola comforted the grief-stricken wife as best she could upon their sad journey to lay the husband and father in the family resting place in their eastern home; and when it proved to be true that Mr. Maurice had left nothing save a small house in the western town, Lola bravely left their elegant New Hampshire home and went to work in the "trade palace," to earn their daily bread, and brighten up their queer little house.

Bijou sang in vain in his tiny cage his sweetest notes; his mistress continued her sad reverie. The day wore on; 1, 2 o'clock came. No dinner was eaten; there was little to cook, and Mrs. Maurice was too ill to eat. A storm of snow was falling fast and furiously, dark clouds had gathered. Lola went up to a little stand of flowers that bravely held up their heads in spite of the gloom.

"Bloom on, you treasure; you cannot know the sorrows of human hearts. Yet I feel as if you comforted me." And she parted the sprays of a luxuriant heliotrope. "Oh—oh!" she cried in an excited tone.

Mrs. Maurice heard her, and came into the room. "Just see here, mamma! Three four-leaved clovers! Old nurse Elsie used to tell me that to find them brought good luck—the dear little shamrocks! I mean to accept them as harbingers of better times," and she kissed the talisman. "Now, for my wish mamma; first, that I may get work; second, that you may get well; third, that, well, I shall leave the good fairies to bring the third. Cheer up, mamsie dear!" And Lola tried to effect a gayety she did not feel.

At 3 Lola was startled by a summons to the door. It proved to be a servant from the great lady of the town, Mrs. Glendale, who had admired Lola's taste in floral arrangements at the last fair. "Would she come and oversee the decorations for a large dinner party next day?"

She hastily donned waterproof and rubbers, and was soon at work, fashioning baskets, wreaths, crosses and bouquets of the bright flowers and smilax. She sang gaily at her task, for she dearly loved the beauties. After her work was finished, Mrs. Glendale paid her liberally, then said, "Miss Maurice, an old gentleman wishes to hear you sing," and, before she could collect her thoughts, she was seated at the grand piano, and a stately old gentleman bending over her.

At first, the voice was faint and weak, but she thought of "father," and how he loved to hear his "song-bird;" then she sang earnestly and simply "Annie Laurie," "Auld Robin Gray," and "Auld Lang Syne."

"Could you teach my little granddaughters to sing like that? I want them to sing the simple, old-fashioned songs as well as the modern music. Could you go home with us to New Orleans?"

"Oh, sir, I cannot leave my mother. Father is dead, and I am all she has. Last winter we were in New Orleans. Father died there."

"Yes, Miss Lola, I knew your father; I helped him to your hotel when he was [illegible] since then, from the dreaded scourge, yellow fever. Be to my orphaned granddaughters an elder sister. I will [illegible] to-morrow."

Lola ran home to tell her mother the great news, and found that lady dressed and greatly excited.

"Only think, Lola, the postman brought a letter from an old friend, who [illegible] sent us a check for $200! I am so glad you do not need to go back to Levering's after all. Here is a recall from there, saying your discharge was a mistake."

"Yes, I am glad [illegible] and now let me tell you my good news, [illegible]"

"Yes, of course we shall, I remember the family well," said Mrs. Maurice, when she had heard the story.

Mr. Le Litre called the next morning, and completed the arrangements. Lola and her mother went with the De Litre family to their Southern home. Lola did prove to be the light of his darkened home, but was not allowed to remain long, as a young southerner wooed her from them.

When Lola stood up to promise love and honor to the bridegroom of her choice, it was under a bridal bell of clover leaves and white blooms. A ring of dear little shamrocks, the stones emeralds, was the engagement ring; the flowers where white clover blossoms.

In a white holly jewel casket she keeps the wreathed leaves. Often she looks at them to remind herself of that dark day in her life and says:

"Mumma, did I not tell you the dear little shamrocks would bring us good fortune? And best of all, they brought me Wallace, my best of husbands."

Choice Miscellany.

During the decade of 1870-80, one hundred and forty-three towns in the state of Massachusetts decreased in population, and nearly thirty-seven per cent. of the population of the state resides upon the territory within a radius of twelve miles from the state house.

An indignant landlord writes demanding the name of the party who first suggested putting coils of rope in sleeping rooms as a protection against fire. He says he provided every bed room in the house with a coil of rope, and the first night three of his guests lowered their baggage from the sixth story window and skipped, leaving several days' board bill unpaid. He allows that being burned to death is bad enough, but running a hotel for fun is a good deal worse.

The oldest cent is 1793. There are two kinds; one has a head upon it with hair flowing as if in a breeze of wind, and on the reverse a circle of chain links, with "One Cent, 1-100" in the centre. This coin is worth $1. The other has a head with a comb in the hair like a modern comb used by small girls to keep the hair back, and a cap of liberty falling off behind. This is worth $2. The cent of 1794 is worth only 10 cents. That of 1799 is worth $4, and that of 1804 $2. Other cents vary from 2 to 25 cents each up to 1837.

The scientific centenarian, M. Chevreull, who is chiefly known in this country on account of his valuable work on color, lately made a communication to the Academie des Sciences with the remarkable comment:—"Morever, gentlemen, the observation is not a new one to me. I had the honor to mention it here, at the meeting of the Academie des Sciences, on the 10th of May, 1812."

The pistol has been the curse of the South and Missouri is trying to limit the number of deadly weapons in that state The senate has passed a bill which prohibits the selling, giving, loaning, hiring, or bartering or the offering to sell, give, loan, hire, or barter to any minor any pistol, revolver, derringer, bowie-knife, or other weapon of like character, or any toy pistol designed to shoot caps or cartridges of any kind, or to be loaded with powder.

A bankrupt's lot is not a happy one in China. The broker of a silk firm in Shanghai which has recently suspended payment was set upon in the street by creditors of the firm, beaten, and hung up by the queue so that his feet swung clear of the ground. Having been discovered by the police in that painful situation he was taken for protection to the police station, followed by the creditors, who declared that if he fell again into their hands they would bite him to death and eat him afterward.

The new law in Indiana relating to oleomargarine is as follows: "Be it enacted by the general assembly of the state of Indiana, that whoever sells or has in his possession with intent to sell, or exposes for sale, or whoever keeps on any table at any hotel, or any other public or private boarding-house, any butter other than that made from pure milk without first labeling the same in large letters "oleomargarine," shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and on conviction thereof shall be fined not more than $50 nor less than $10."

THE "STAR OF BETHLEHEM."

It is Expected to Appear This Year.

From the New York Sun.

The story is once more revived that astronomers expect a reappearance of the so-called star of Bethlehem, either this year or next year. Astronomers would, no doubt, rejoice to behold that celebrated star again blazing in all its glory in the heavens, but they are far from expecting it. The readiness with which the suggestion has been accepted that the star which suddenly made its appearance in the constellation of Cassiopeia in 1572, outshining even the most brilliant of the planets, was identical with the star which the magi saw at the birth of Christ, indicates how strong the popular love of the marvellous is. The only evidence of identity is that in the years 1294 and 945 brilliant stars suddenly made their appearance in the same quarter of the heavens in which the wonderful star of 1572 was seen. Assuming that these three stars were one and the same body, which for some unknown reason blazes out with surpassing brilliancy once in about 310 or 315 years, it is seen that it may have appeared some time near the date of Christ's birth, and that it may appear again at any time within a few years. But there is no certainty that the stars seen in 1264 and 945 were in the same place where the star of 1572 blazed out. The records of their appearance are of the most meagre and unsatisfactory kind. Still, it may be said that the evidence of the identity of these stars, upon which is based the opinion that we shall soon behold this celestial wonder again, is fully as strong as that adduced to prove the identity of many comets whose periodicity is assumed. If this curious star should reappear, it might throw a flood of light upon the constitution of some of the heavenly bodies, for the astronomers, armed with modern instruments and skilled in modern methods of scientific research, would study it in a very different manner from that in which it was studied in the time of Tycho Brahe, when it last shone in our skies.

Sara Bernhardt's Confessions.

Some of Sara Bernhadt's confessions in her forthcoming book of memoirs are as remarkable for egotism as anything she has ever done. She was not very pretty as a girl, she thinks, but she "resembled a little the Mater Dolorosa of Velasquez," and she moreover had "the thin arms of the Fornarina, the indolence of Titian's Venus, the dreamy look of Raphael's St. Cecilia." Her family, in her view, are quite as remarkable as she is in their resemblances to beautiful or famous people. "My uncle, on the father's side," she says, "had the grace of Apollo of Belvidere. My uncle on my mother's side resembled Antinous, and my cousins were tall, handsome, with fine blue eyes, fair hair, and white teeth. They were constantly set forth as types of elegance and good taste. They were all full of wit and spirit. I will say nothing of myself, but have the persuasion that I resemble my family."

Jefferson wrote that "great cities are pestilential to the morals, health, and liberties of man," and to-day everybody is swarming into cities; [illegible] for the future.

Another New Road.

Duluth, Special Telegram, May 7.—The Lake Superior & Northwestern Railway company was organized here to day. The main line is to run from Duluth, in a northwesterly direction, to a point on the Red River, at or near the mouth of the Red Lake river, and the branches are as follows: First, from a point on the line west of the Mississippi river to the northern boundary of the State, between Rainy river or lake and Red lake; second, from the same point on the Mississippi river to Brainerd; third, from Duluth via Vermilion, to the northern water boundary of the State; fourth, from Duluth, in a northerly direction, along the noth shore to Pigeon river. The corporation is to begin its life on the 10th of this month. The capital stock is put at $3,000,000, in shares of $100. The incorporators are James Bardon, Superior; John H. Upham, George R. Stuntz, Joseph A. Mannheim, W. C. Sargent, A. C. Jones, John McGuire, and Herman Burg, of Duluth, and Leonidas Merritt, Oneota. J. H. Upham is president, G. R. Stuntz vice-president, and W. C. Sargent, secretary and treasuer. The Chain Line road runs nearly the same route as the Duluth & Winnipeg, and the lately incorporated Duluth & Northwe tern. There will be a scramble between the roads for water frontage on the Minnesota point and the right of way across the bay to Rice's point, and perhaps this is one of the main objects in the organization of the companies.—Pioneer Press.

St. Hilaire Happenings.

St. Hilaire Times.

Charley Westerbery from Crookston, is in town and has bought two lots on which he is going to erect a hotel.

We are informed by Judge Ives that the townsite owners, together with the railroad company, will shortly erect a $6000 hotel here.

As we passed by Shirley this week, we saw large quantities of ties unloaded there and we should judge nearly enough to finish the St. Hilaire branch.

We dropped into C. C. Utzinger's this week, and found his billiard hall in fine shape with three billiard and pool tables, and in every respect it is a first-class place.

It is claimed by these who are in a position to know that John Cromb, the present Register of the U. S. Land Office at Crookston, is the most correct book-keeper and the best land officer in the State.

Mr. Grondal, railroad inspector, was in town this week, prospecting and looking over things in general. Mr. Grondal thinks, beyond a doubt, that the road will be completed to this place during the present month.

Messrs. Miller and Hoard came in on Thursday from Red Lake Falls. Mr. Miller owns lots south of the Pioneer saloon, and will build a store just as soon as he is assured of the railroad. Mr. Hoard is looking up a location for a jewelry establishment. Both seem like pleasant, agreeable gentleman, and we would be glad to welcome them to our midst.

City and Country (Columbus, O.) for May has appeared, filled with its usual interesting and instructive matter and more illustrations than ever. It announces another special offer this month—that of a cloth bound book, full gilt—by Dr. Dio Lewis, entitled "In a Nutshell," to every new subcriber at $1,50. Its He-No Tea offer still continues. The able "Family Physician" articles of Dr. J. H. Hansford still grow in interest, and Otis Tinkham in his "Talks to Farmers" opens a mine of wealth to every farmer. Its "Household" department is one of its special features, while its exposure of swindles is scathing and of immense value to every reader. Any of our readers may have a sample copy of City and Country for examination by mentioning this paper. Address Will C. Turner & Co., 217, 219 and 221 N. High St, Columbus, O.

P. J. MCGUIRE, Clerk.

A few weeks ago, when it first became known that the property now called Sampson's Addition would be platted and put on the spring market, nearly all who knew the land well, and its location relatively to the city, began making preparations to buy so soon as the lots would be on sale. Why this high, rolling, river encircled land, thrust by the great bend in the river within three blocks of the business center of our bustling city, should find such favor with the majority, needs no explanation to those who have ever seen it. The poor man, the man of moderate means, likes to have his unpretentious cottage as beautifully situated as possible, he wants it near his business, sheltered from the cutting winds of our frigid winters, and, in this country, he looks for a dry cellar and a good well. And when all these are offered him in at low prices and on easy terms, is it any wonder that he buys, then?

Every patriotic citizen wishes to see Crookston keep her place as the Queen City of the Valley, and if to any one thing more than another she owes that place, that one is her pleasant, sheltered position in the wooded basin of the Red Lake River, and if the limits of the city extend, as they must, it should be along the same basin; westward every live town in this country has grown, does grow, and WILL grow, and does not Sampson's Addition lie in this [illegible], and due west of the heart of the town?

But this is not all, nor even the beginning of our answer to the "Why" of the anxious inquirer. The promises at first made by the Crookston Improvement Company are in a fair way to fulfilment. The streets of the new addition are rapidly being graded by a large force of men, and, by the way, on account of the sandy nature of the soil, these streets will always be dry and clean.

The contract for the large 250 barrel flouring mill has been let to Walker & Baily, and the foundation for the mill will be laid within the week. The Morrisey Bros. have bought mill-lots and have contracted to put up a foundry and a machine shop. Six dwelling houses are already building, and over thirty more are secured by contract to be built before November next. We are not afraid to prophesy that over one hundred dwelling will be built on this addition within six months. The company have inserted in most of their contracts with purchasers an agreement to build one wagon and one foot bridge within six months, and wire cables for the latter have now been ordered and no doubt we shall be able to cross the river on a in two weeks. The wagon bridge, the company purpose building is to be a low waterple bridge, just such a one as has served the people of Fargo and Moorhead for more than five years. This, of course, will necessitate the removal of stringers and planks every spring, leaving the people of the Woodland Addition (or Fifth ward) without a wagon bridge for perhaps two or three weeks. But mark you, long before another spring comes round, our city fathers will see that this growing ward is connected with the city.

THE SIDE TRACK

of the St. P., M. & Manitoba road has been located and surveyed, and will beyond question be graded and laid in a month. There is talk, which we have every reason to believe is more than talk, of continuing this track across the river to meet the Grand Forks branch.

A PAPER FOR THE TIMES.

The CHICAGO DAILY NEWS is the pioneer of cheap journalism in the West. It was founded Dec. 23, 1875, as an evening paper with editions at noon, 3 and 5 o'clock. A complete newspaper,—complete in the one essential feature of American journalism, i. e., presenting all the news,—sold on the street at any price less than the conventional nickel, was an innovation in western journalism, and, like all new enterprises, the "cheap paper" had to contend with long-established custom and even prejudice before securing the recognition it sought and deserved. At the end of the first year, 1876, it had achieved a daily sale ranging from 8,000 to 10,000 copies. From this time forward its progress was beyond all precedent in American journalism. In 1877 its average daily circulation was 22,087 copies; in 1878, 38,314 copies; in 1879, 45,194 copies; in 1880, 54,801 copies. On the morning of March 21, 1881, the CHICAGO MORNING NEWS made its first appearance. In September following, the sixth month of its publication, its circulation amounted to 490,019 copies, or a daily average of 18,840 copies,—a circulation never before attained by any daily paper in the United States, within a corresponding time.

The CHICAGO DAILY NEWS, therefore, as now published, consists of MORNING, NOON, and EVENING ISSUES, known respectively as the MORNING NEWS, NOON NEWS, and EVENING NEWS. The average combined circulation of the three issues of the DAILY NEWS now exceeds 90,000 copies each day. To appreciate the exceptional extent of this vast circulation it is only necessary to state that it is over three times the circulation of any other daily paper in Chicago or the West, while its circulation in the city of Chicago is GREATER than ALL other Chicago daily papers COMBINED. Being an independent paper, the organ of no party, sect, or class, it is the one universally read Chicago paper. The subscription price of the DAILY NEWS, either MORNING or EVENING issue, is $6.00 per year, or $3.00 for four months, postage included.

On July 2, 1878, the DAILY NEWS purchased the CHICAGO EVENING POST, consolidated its daily issue with the DAILY NEWS, and continued its weekly issue under the name of the CHICAGO WEEKLY NEWS. The WEEKLY NEWS under its present name and management is therefore less than five years old, though as a consecutive weekly publication it is now in its twentieth year. The CHICAGO WEEKLY NEWS takes a corresponding field among weekly newspapers to that occupied by the DAILY NEWS among dailies. It gives the news of the world in condensed yet complete form. Its Chicago market quotations are especially complete and trustworthy. That the CHICAGO WEEKLY NEWS has been correct in its judgment of the requirements of a large class of readers of the weekly press is best evidenced by the extent of its circulation, which aggregated in the month immediately preceding the date of this writing, 202,053 copies, or a weekly average of 50,513 copies The subscription price of the WEEKLY NEWS is but SEVENTY-FIVE CENTS per year, postage included.

The phenomenal success of the CHICAGO NEWS in both its DAILY and WEEKLY ISSUES has been achieved by observing that fundamental principle of offering the best article of its kind in the market at the lowest cost to the purchaser. The CHICAGO NEWS is cheap only in price. The character of its news service is unsurpassed. It is a member of the Western Associated Press, and in addition to the unrivalled news service furnished by this Association, it enjoys the exceptional advantage of its own special telegraphic wire from Chicago to Washington and New York on the East, and to Milwaukee and St. Paul on the North. Giving all the news through reportorial and telegraphic failities unsurpassed by those of any other Chicago paper, it commends itself to all classes in the community, to rich and poor alike, in that it offers an absolutely complete record of the news of the day in concise form, without the needless verbiage and amplification which render so many metropolitan journals "a weariness to the flesh," while its price brings it within the reach of all classes. It is a paper for the times.

That is certainly rough on innocent printers, but how do you know it is loaded, Mr. Courier?

Peterson's Magazine for June, already on our table, is an unusually brilliant number, even for this popular ladyie's book. The principal steel-plate, "Mistress Soft-Eyes," is an exquisite affair, illustrating a most charming story. The colored plates, printed from the steel. There is a large colored pattern for a Quilt, in the fashionable German Linen-Thread Embroidery, and more than a score of other designs for the Work-Table. The engravings of fashions are numerous and choice, all being late Paris costumes, and not the patterns of second-rate America dress-makers. Now is a particularly good time to subscribe, especially for those who do not wish back numbers, a new volume beginning with the July number. With this new volume will be commenced a copyright novelet, "A Fifth Avenue Romance," which the publisher predicts will be the most popular for years. Every lady ought to take "Peterson." We do not see how any home can be complete without it. The price is but two dollars a year, with great deductions to clubs, and a handsome premium to the person getting up the club. Specimens are sent, gratis, to those wishing to get up clubs. Address Peterson's Magazine, 306 Chestnut Street, Philadelphia, Pa.

Fergus Falls Journal: S. R. Norris who bought the brick yard of P. MacMaster has just contracted with Stanford Bros. for the furnishing of 10,000 palettes to be used in brick making. The material required will be about 100 feet of lumber and 50,000 laths, and the cost will be not less than $1,000.

Fergus Falls Journal: Will Smith's exploit of taking a thirty pound sturgeon this morning, was discounted by Charles Strauss, who an hour or so later brought in a fish weighing seventy pounds, his performance however was also "laid in the shade" by G. M. Decker, who, about half past ten came through the streets with the "climax capper" on a wheel barrow. Weight 104 pounds, length 6 feet 3 inches. They were all speared below the Roller mills.

Bartlett, at the end of the Manitoba road, has grown into a town of several hundred within three months. All kinds of business is represented there and it is not an unusual sight to see from fifty to one hundred teams at a teams loading with merchandise for the Devil's Lake country. Villages have sprung up as if by magic in the vicinity, including Niagara, inhabited by New York emigrants, Michigan City by settlers from Michigan City, Indiana, Mapes settlement, by people from Ohio and Iowa. Pushing beyond these are Devil's Lake city, Creel city, Grand Harbor, and on toward Dry Cooley, the Turtle mountains and Mouse river country. Prices of merchandise, provisions, groceries, etc., are cheaper than would be expected, and everything points to a rapid and immediate building up of the country.

St. Paul Globe: A. E. Johnson, emigration agent of the Manitoba road, has just returned from a trip through the Red River valley, and Devil's Lake country. In the former section seeding is about three-quarters done, and with fair weather will be completed during the current week. Small farmers completed that branch of their work last week, and are now breaking new ground. The snow of the past winter has had a good effect upon the ground. Wheat planted ten days ago has begun to sprout and, the general opinion is that with fair weather, a good harvest will be gathered. The new comers there this year are able bodied and willing to work, with hardly any of the class known as speculators. They are men of means and will be permanent. The season is being availed of for building up of towns and villages, and improvements are in progress, though there is a lack of residence accommodations. There is no investment, Mr. Johnson thinks, so sure of steady and substantial returns as building residences in the Red river valley.

The Wheat Outlook.

In addition to the newspaper dispatches announcing the wide-spread injury to the winter wheat in the West and Southwest, we have received advices from St. Louis that upon very careful estimates the winter wheat crop of the country will fall at least twenty-five per cent, below the average. On the strength of this sales were made in Chicago the other day at $1.12 per bushel for wheat to be delivered at any time within the year, and 100,000 bushels were contracted for, to be delivered January 1, 1884, at $1,20. This indicates that the dealers look for high prices.

Added to the shortage in winter wheat, a large decrease in acreage is observed in that portion of Minnesota south of the Manitoba road, which comprises about three-fourths of the wheat area of the State, a great quantity of land heretofore sown to wheat being transferred to other crops. A similar decrease is also reported from Wisconsin. These facts indicate a very marked diminution in the wheat crop outside of the new Northwest.

Another fact to still further decrease the wheat crop is the sowing of large area to oats in Minnesota, Dakota and Montana, especially Dakota. Oats have always brought a higher price proportionately than wheat and a great many farmers, along the Northern Pacific especially, are sowing it extensively this year. The oat crop may not be overdone, as much of it is needed in this new, growing country, but its effect will be to lessen the wheat crop.

Under these circumstances it seems the very best thing our farmers can do is to sow every acre of wheat they can. The spring is favorable and a good crop may be expected, and in our opinion, which is shared by most of the best [illegible] more the coming fall for $1.25 per bushel. Let the farmers raise plenty of feed and all other things needed, but let all the ground be sown to wheat possible. Let it be put in in good order, using good seed, and make every effort possible to raise the largest yield the country will produce. It will pay. —[Larimore Pioneer.

The National Reform Association.

This is a Society organized to maintain existing Christian features in the American government, and to secure a suitable religious amendment to the constitution of the United States. During the present year this Society has greatly enlarged its operations. Four district secretaries are devoting their whole time to the work, holding conventions, addressing churches and public meetings circulating petitions, and extending the membership of the organization. Within six months fourteen conventions, and more than two hundred public meetings have been held in behalf of this cause. The members of the association enrolled during the current year and contributing to its funds, are more than two thousand, and its list of officers includes many prominent and influential men. The Hon. Felix R. Brunot, of Pittsburg, is president. The Christian Statesman, of Philadelphia, a weekly journal, is the organ of the movement, and has recently been enlarged to sixteen pages.

Among the features of the government which this association aims to conserve are our Sabbath laws, the use of the bible in public schools, prayer in the National and State Legislatures, and the Christian law of marriage in opposition to the lax divorce legislation now so common. Some suitable change in the constitution is deemed by this society to be indispensably necessary, since that instrument, in its present form, is extensively regarded as an expression of the secular theory of government, and is constantly employed as an argument against all that is Christian in the usage and administration of our government. For the publications of the society, and any information bearing on this movement address, T. P. Stevenson, corresponding secretary, 1520 Chestnut St., Philadelphia, pa.

Work upon the Presbyterian church is re-commenced.

Geo. Warninger's house is approaching completion and will be a fine building.

Spring wheat begins to show up rank and green and bids fair to make a grand stand.

Louis Hanson, of Ada, was in the city on Saturday last visiting with old friends.

Houston & Co., whose ad appears in this issue, are doing a rushing business in machinery this season.

The Brewery Co., have contracted to furnish the Winnipeg market with two carloads of beer per month.

M. W. Jenson was in from the Garden town on Monday. He says that early sowed grain is looking splendidly.

Hon. Knute Nelson paid our city a pleasant visit on Monday. He looks very much improved in health this spring.

Dr. Just is again able to get out a bit after a wrestle with the fever. He is thinner'n a shad but will round out again all O. K.

Mr. G. N. Courtright, of Garfield was in the city on Wednesday. He reports seeding nearly all done and farmers all anticipating big crops.

Pete Misgen, having rented his stand to Martin Bang & Co., will go to the Devil's Lake country to speculate in townsites and things.

Ed. Schrader invites all who wish to go to Red Lake Falls or St. Hilaire, to call at the red barn for a nobby rig. Ed. has some good ones.

Ed. Schrader invites those who wish to go to Red Lake Falls or St. Hilaire to call at the red barn, Main Street, between Third and Fourth Sts.

O. M. Omlie had to come over from Grafton this week for a breath of fresh air and to enjoy the evidences of civilization awhile. He says that his sales of horses have been good this spring.

Jerome Brothers have one of the handiest ice houses in the city. It is so arranged that ropes and pulleys handle the ice taking it from the wagon and depositing it in the ice house with but very little exertion necessary.

We are told that a man was found in a slough, near Maple Bay post office, one day last week, nearly dead from cold and exhaustion. It is said that he blundered into the slough while drunk, was unable to get out, and was there several hours before being discovered.

Michael Jeffers, of Red Lake Falls, was in on Monday night. Reports seeding nearly completed. Says he has built a comfortable house and stables on his claim and is going to try 20 acres of wheat on new breaking. Tom has opened a first-class boarding house and is doing well.

John O'Brien, formerly of this city but recently of Fisher, has rented Dr. Thomas' room on Robert Street and is having it neatly papered up and will open a sample room on Friday or Saturday of this week. Johnny has many friends in this city and vicinity who will be glad to welcome him back.

Supt. Carruth is busy making arrangments for the coming teachers institute and anticipates a big attendance. Speaking of our city schools Mr. Carruth informed us that he finds every department crowded to its utmost limit and he thinks that our school authorities might profitably consider the project of building a new school house at an early day. At the present rate of increase the buildings will soon be altogether too small. Another ward school building is needed.

Hundreds of fish have this spring been taken from below the dam but the one that was speared on Tuesday night takes the cake. He was five feet and eight inches long and weighed 65 pounds. He was taken by a carpenter, named Lane, and when brought into the city caused more excitement than would Langtry or any other celebrated whale now on exhibition. Hundreds gazed upon this mammoth sturgeon before his carcass has sold to butcher LeDue who dressed him and who informed us that the weight was just 65 pounds before being dressed.

A man from Black River on Saturday got his team badly mired just west of Hanscome's lumber yard, in the (almost) re-constructed Lake View lake. It seems enough of a wonder to be a miracle that any man in his right mind could be found innocent enough to drive through such a place in broad day light but, strange as it appears one man tried it and—failed. He was extremely fortunate in rescuing his team alive after four or five hours hard work. As this is a public highway the city should fill it up, or fence it so that strangers, driving through in the night may not get caught in the trap.

Splendid growing weather in these days.

John LaBree, of Thief Riveer was in the city on Wednesday.

D. H. Fisk, of Ada, shook hands with his friends on Wednesday.

Hundreds of fish are being taken from the river below the dam.

Lovely growing weather and everybody seems to be improving it by making gardens.

Hart was trump. The boys had a full hand and yet were badly beaten by the knave.

W. F. Arnold, of St. Hilaire arrived on Tuesday evening just in time for McAllister.

John Knuppe has moved his quarters to the little building one door north of Hack & Gallasch's store.

The boys claims that the Hart race was a dead give-away. That is, all who had any money up on the result.

P. J. Lachapelle informs the JOURNAL that a convent school will be established in Crookston by parties from Oakland, Cal.

The great and only Ted Irving will appear with the McAllisters troupe to night. Dont fail to be there in time.

Ed. Schrader has put a condition on his barn just over his office, which furnishes a good storage for sleighs and cutters.

John Zaiser, of Red Lake Falls was in the city on Tuesday with several teams after beer kegs for the Red Lake Falls brewery.

Ed. Walsh has moved into the Judge Reynolds house on Houston Ave., and Mr. J. L. Bailey has moved into Ed's former residence,

The body of foreman Larson has not been recovered though diligent search has been made. It has doubtless gone down the river some distance.

Remember the great Auction sale of Dry Goods and Gents Furnishing Goods, at Utzinger's old stand on Second Street, commencing on Saturday May 19th at 10 o'clock a. m.

Ladies Walking jackets and Delmans at $2.90 3.00 4.00 and 5.00 very cheap New York Store. [3-4]

Ole. Bang has thoroughly cleaned, re-fitted and re-furnished the building on Fletcher Avenue recently occupied as a boarding house and this week opens a first-class hotel.

Houston & Co., are receiving McCormick Self-binders and Mowers by the carload. These machines are among the leading machines in the country and have had big sales heretofore.

Geo. E. Driver opened out his sample room on Monday holding a grand levee. George has fitted up a perfect little gem of a room in its line and intends to keep nothing but a first class place.

The story goes that Dave Williams, while fishing on Tuesday drew out a monster having four legs. Supposing he had taken a crocigator or an allodile he cut the line and let the lizzard crawl back into the water,

Our city fathers would do a good thing if they would expend a few dollars in paint for the roof of the pump house. Being of tin it is rusting badly and will spoil if not attended to soon.

Since the robbery at Cowing Bros., store some of our business men are getting in the habit of leaving lamps burning in their stores. This is a good idea and should be supplemented by more Street lamps,

J. K. Arnold arrived on Tuesday with his foreman, has rented a room in the Clement's block and will resurrect the Northern Tier about June 1st. If Capt. will remain true to himself he will have a fighting chance for success.

G. M. Barber & Co., have their new store nearly ready for occupancy. Mr. Segar has finished papering, the counters, and cases, made in St. Paul are in place and they expect to open out on Saturday. In front of the prescription case is a French plate glass mirror which is a fine one.

On Tuesday afternoon the new frame work of Lee & Herrick's flouring mill commenced to assume a perpendicular and on Wednesday one story was up. The building will be three stories, sixty feet high and the contractor, Mr. Henry Nolan informs us that he expects to have it ready to receive the machinery in thirty days.

On Friday last an individual from Gentilly got too much booze and in attempting to start for home fell out of the buggy under the horse. Getting pretty noisy he was observed by our argus-eyed marshal and taken to the cooler. In due course of time he was hailed before a magistrate and after replenishing the city's funds to the tune of $5 and costs" he departed for home a sadder, and let us hope a wiser man.

The Northwestern Brass Band of Crookston will give a grand ball in Ericsson's Hall, on Thursday evening May 24th 1883 for the benefit of the band. The boys have been at the expense of procuring instruments for the purpose of giving Crookston a good band and our citizens should not be backward in patronizing them and encouraging their efforts to organize and maintain the band. It is composed of young business men whose sole object is to liven up the town a little. Let there be a good turn out at the ball.

On Sunday last as Martin Bang, Mr. Peterson, a tailor whose name is said to be Wildman and another gentleman were driving along Broadway, the tailor suddenly become impressed with the idea that he must drive the team and secured the reins, taking them out of Bang's hands. It soon became evident that the team was too many for him to handle and, becoming alarmed he jumped out, either throwing the lines or dropping them as he flew out. Mr. Bang managed secure one line and froze to that with a grip of vice, but that was of little avail. The team crossed the bridge, ran past the blacksmith shop and into a shanty in the rear of the shop occupied by a Dane, smashing things up for keeps, wrecking the dishes and hurting a small boy pretty severely, and landing eventually in Allen's brickyard where they were captured. The occupants of the buggy had lit out before the crash except Mart who stuck to the ship and brought her into port with all sails flying. As Mr. Peterson is a crockery man he soon repaired the damage to the Dane's crockery department by sending over a new set of dishes on Monday morning and about $25 more for incidentals made the boys all right. The injured boy is said to by all O. K. and the boys now feel better than they did.

The Foot Race.

The match between Hart and Fisher came off as advertised yesterday afternoon. By 2 o'clock, people began to wend their way towards Eshelman park, and by 3 o'clock, when the men were called up for the race, there was perhaps 200 spectators present. A large number of sporting men came over from Crookston, also several from Fargo and Fergus Falls. Fisher had the cali n the betting and his friends took all the bets that were offered at even money.. It is estimated that at least $3,000 changed hands on the result. Both men were in good form and evenly matched as to size. Hart has the longest stride, but Fisher is the quickest in getting away. The start was a standing one, the signal to go being a pistol shot. As the report rang out on the air they dashed off on eventerms. Fisher being the quickest, by a fine burst of speed, soon led, and mantained his advantage to the score, which he crossed in 10½ seconds winning, by two feet, which was excellent time considering the condition of the track, which was somewhat heavy. The referee and stake-holder, Mr. B. Martin, of Fargo, decided the rase in favor of Fisher. Many present, expressed it as their opinion that the race was a hippodrome, and that Hart did not try to let himself out. etc., but there appears to be no definite proofs that such is the case. At Fergus Falls, in the rage last week, it was run by a flying start and Hart won with ease. Fisher being the quickest to get away had the advantage in this rase in his favor, which landed him the winner. Hart's friends offered to make another match for $500, with the flying start, but Fisher's backers declined.—[Grand Forks Herald.

Shot!

On Wednesday Sheriff Zwickey went out in the country with a warrant for the arrest of Israel La Fortune, charged with arson. Not finding La Fortune at home the Sheriff started to return and about one mile out met La Fortune going home on horseback. The Sheriff states that he ordered La Fortuen to stop where, upon La Fortune urged his horse into a run and attempted to avoid him. Seeing that La Fortune would escape the Sheriff drew his revolver thinking to shoot the horse, fired and shot La Fortier through the body. He then took La Fortune into the buggy and brought him to the Lake View hotel and summoned Drs. Van Dyke and Denniston who, upon examination found the ball within about half an inch of the skin having passed almost entirely through the body. The case is a critical one. La Fortune is still alive but very low. We have not seen Sheriff Zwickey and we give the statements of the case as we gleaned them from those who pretend to know, reserving comments until an investigation shall have revealed all the facts in the case. It is a very sad affair and no one regrets its occurrence more than does Sheriff Zwickey.

"TWO SONGS OF LIFE."

I.

Pluck, at [illegible] from its stem, a rose—
Sweet will it [illegible] when the day doth close;
Take from th[illegible] nds a golden grain—
A thousand [illegible] will it shine again.
Rose tints w[illegible] live in thy memory-hall;
The grain w[illegible] the boundless sea recall.
If so little delight can bring,
Is man's love but perishing?

II.

Take from foam-white waves a shell;
Write therein a song of life;
Of man's bravery in the strife;
Woman's trust—engrave it well;
Cast it on the spray dashed beach;
Sea will speed it, yond thy reach;
But list at eve—the sounding waves
Will echo, softly, from their caves
This sweet song—believe it, then—
"True are women; true are men."

Mary Aristine Peck in the Utica Observer.

THE WISE SCHOOL TEACHER.

The bell rang out cheerily from the window of the little red school-house, and there was hurrying of childish feet from the green in front of the entrance, as the young teacher drew her hand in, and the clatter of the bell ceased.

"There, I told you so; I knew we'd got a new teacher before I saw her, 'cause Susie Mill's father is committee man, and she told me so yesterday. Miss Hurd is married, you know."

"What did you say, Nell?" asked a handsome but mischievous-looking boy of about 12 years, as he pulled Nellie's curls.

"Be still now, Frank Ayers, or I'll tell mother. We've got a new teacher. Mattie didn't believe it till she saw her. I hope she'll whip you every day, and make you behave yourself."

"Sho! I guess it will take more'n a dozen like her to make me mind, Nell."

And with boyish gyrations he quickly reached the entrance, and peeped in at the teacher.

"Ting-a-ling," the bell sounded again from the desk, and the children entered quietly, all but Frank Ayers, who stood peeping in and making faces until they were all seated; and then, with a clownish gait, noisily followed.

The teacher waited until he took his seat, and then, after reading the Bible and prayer, she went around with a book and pencil, to learn the names of her scholars, when her attention was called by a small, upraised hand.

"What do you wish?" she asked.

"Frank Ayers says he shan't mind no dough-head of a teacher."

"You had better not repeat any such language," she replied.

"Well, but he meant you."

Miss Stephens tapped with her pencil on her head, and smiling, said:

"If my head is dough, I think it is quite well baked," and went on with her duties till she came to the form where Frank Ayers sat, and a suppressed titter went around as she stepped beside him and asked his name.

"Abednego Mulliken," he replied.

A tittering laugh followed this reply, and the teacher looked around reprovingly, and said:

"I am surprised, children; that you should laugh aloud so. What is your age, Abednego?"

Books were raised to cover laughing faces. Unmindful of it, she said:

"That would be about June. You are very near my age. I would not think you were so old, and you are not quite so advanced in your studies as is usual at that age."

This was most unexpected, having his replies, for which he expected to be reproved or punished, taken in this way, and he became very uncomfortable, from the name that he had given himself, which was freely applied by the schoolmates. All of his roguery was treated in the same manner, and the teacher was kind to him, while his schoolmates were constantly turning the laugh intended for the teacher upon him, and he soon learned that he had a shrewd one to deal with, and her kindness was like punishment to him in his rebellious state.

Thus three weeks passed, and no violence marred the harmony of the school. The other scholars became very fond of the new teacher.

Showy posters were put up in every conspicuous place, announcing the coming of a great circus and menagerie. All the boys in town were nearly wild over the great event. Miss Stevens found it difficult to keep them from whispering about it during school hours. Frank Ayers was much excited, and knew just which way it would come, and just what time they ought to start to meet it, as they proposed.

Now, Frank, active as he was, had one bad, lazy habit, which his parents tried to break him of, but which, I fear, he did not try very hard to overcome, so long as it did not interfere with his plans or pleasures. His father often reproved him, as he liked to see all of his family in season at the breakfast table; yet still Frank seldom rose betimes.

When called at the usual time on the morning of the circus, he turned lazily over, as was his custom, and settled down for another nap, and that nap proved too long for him to keep his appointment with the boys. They waited a while for their leading spirit, and then hurried away, wondering what kept him.

Nearly an hour too late, blustering and fretting, Frank seized his hat, and rushed away without his breakfast. He took the nearer way across the pastures, and ran fleetly along, startling many a staid bossy at her breakfast. Half way across the third one he came to sudden, most unexpected stop, as he was thrown violently forward into a rapidly-flowing brook. One loud cry of pain, and then he lay moaning in unconsciousness.

There were hurried steps near, and soon a white, startled face was bending over the insensible boy, and trembling hands strove to raise him up. Miss Stevens had been to watch through the night with one of her pupils who was ill, and was just returning to her boarding-place passing along by the side of the brook, this being her chosen, usual way to the school-house, instead of the longer, less agreeable way by the dusty road. Striving to raise him up, she found that his feet were entangled in a wire, which was carried some distance across the narrow path, a cunning snare.

She quickly released his feet, scarcely wondering at the snare in her fright, as she found the blood flowing freely from his nose, and a deep cut made by a pointed rock near the left temple. Greatly alarmed, she laid him back on the grass, and ran to an adjoining field and called some laborers. One of them carried Frank to his home, while the other went for a physician. Miss Stevens hastened on to inform his parents.

Upon examination it was found that one arm was broken, and his head was badly bruised, beside the wound upon the temple. He was unconscious for some time after he got home, and, as Mrs. Ayers was much affected by the accident, Miss Stevens remained with her, and so the first face that met Frank's gaze on returning to consciousness was his teacher's, and, looking sadly at her a moment, his eyes filled with tears, which he quickly brushed away, and, taking his hand in hers, she said:

"I am very sorry for you, dear Frank."

He gave her a grateful look, and then clung nervously to her hand as the painful operation upon his arm began, his mother being too much affected to stay near him during it; and she cheered and soothed him til it was through with, remaining with him until he fell into an uneasy stupor, still holding her hand.

Frank awoke from that stupor tossing in delirium from inflammatory action of the sensitive brain, and for two weeks mischievous Frank was very ill. Every moment of time that Miss Stevens could spare from her duties as teacher was spent with him, and no other hand could soothe him so well in his delirious moments as his faithful teacher. In these moments he was continually lamenting something he had done, and telling how sorry he was.

The crisis passed, and he lay pale and helpless for days, watching Miss Stevens intently as she moved about caring for him, till his eyes would fill with tears, and he would put up his hand and hide them; and one day Miss Stevens stood beside him when this happened, and she laid her hand upon his, and said:

"What is it, Frank? Please tell me."

"I—I am so sorry," he sobbed, as the tears fell fast over his wan cheeks.

She soothed him, and said:

"Yes, yes, dear Frank, I know you are, and you must not worry any more about it."

"But, do you know about it? It might have killed you!" he sobbed convulsively.

"Killed me? Oh, no, Frank!"

"But the doctor said it might of killed me, and you would have fallen heavier," he moaned.

A little light dawned upon the teacher's mind as she said:

"Why, what do you mean, Frank?"

"I—I put it there to trip you up, th day the boys laughed at me so, but, oh, I am so sorry!" he moaned again.

She soothed him, and assured him of her forgiveness, and grief at his misfortune.

Frank arose from that illness a new creature, for, although the natural vivacity of his temperament asserted itself with returning vigor, it found vent in harmless mirth, never indulged at the expense of another; and he became, under the guidance of his own exertions, the most loveable pupil, instead of the worst boy, and the tyrant of the school, as he had formerly been considered.

"GLUED FOR LIFE."

The Man Who Wanted His Wife Completely Stopped from Flirting

A couple from away down in the hills came to town to get married. The groom, apparently about thirty years of age, wore a clay-colored suit of jeans and black-snake whip. The bride, who was scarcely more than twenty, was indeed a blooming beauty. Making their way to a justice of the peace and taking a license out of his pocket, the love-stricken man asked:

"Be you the 'squire?"

"I be," said the 'squire "What is it you wish?"

"Have you the power to marry people and hitch 'em solid?"

"Yes, sir."

"So it can never be undone?"

"Yes, sir."

"Fire ahead, 'squire."

The 'squire proceeded to business, and when he got as far as the question to the girl, "Do you take this man to be your lawful and wedded husband?" the groom lengthened the ceremony by the following additional questions to her, for he wanted to be "hitched tighter nor wax:"

"And you won't have nothing more to do with Bill Sykes?"

"No."

"Nur Sam Hill?"

"No."

"Nur Pete Jones?"

"No."

"See here, Sally, don't look down on the floor that way; that means you don't know whether you will or not. Look squar in my face, Sally."

Then Sally looked "squar" in his face and he continued:

"Nur Jack Powers?"

"No."

Here the 'squire interrupted and said:

"I don't think it necessary to pin the young lady down so closely. She promised me to be your true and lawful wife, and that's enough."

"Squire you don't know that girl like I do. She's a coquet. She flirts with every fellow who gets struck after her, and there is a dozen of 'em. Now I want that business stopped, and I want it done here by law."

"So be it," said the 'squire; "Sarah Peters is wedded to you for life and no power on earth can take her from you."

"That's the talk! Come on, Sally; you're mine. We're glued for life! Oh—wait til I pay the squire."

He paid the squire $1—all he had—and left for his country wagon happier than he'll ever be again.

Victoria and Mrs. Lowell.

A pleasant story illustrating Queen Victoria's kindness and consideration is told in a London paper. Mrs. Lowell, the wife of the American minister, is in very delicate health, and was not able to go to court last season. This year, however, she resolved to run the risk of attending the first drawing-room, but was obliged to apply for a dispensation in some small matter of costume. These questions are always brought under the queen's own immediate notice, and in this case her Majesty, besides assenting to Mrs. Lowell's request, sent her private message that she was on no account to come to the drawing-room unless she received the permission of her medical advisers; and that if they could sanction her attendance at the palace, her majesty would have much pleasure in paying her a visit at the legation.

Dismissed to Fame.

Seeming calamities often turn out blessings. Such was the case when Hawthorne was dismissed from an office in the Custom House.

One wintry day, Hawthorne received at his office notifications that his service would no longer be required. With heaviness of heart he repaired to his humble home. His young wife recognizes the change, and stands waiting for the silence to be broken. At length he falters, "I am removed from office."

Then she leaves the room; she returns with fuel and kindles a bright fire with her own hands; next she brings pen, paper and ink and sets them beside him. Then she touches the sad man on the shoulder, and as he turns to the beaming face, says, "Now you can write your book."

The cloud cleared away. The lost office looked like a cage from which he had escaped. "The Scarlet Letters" was written, and a marvellous success rewarded the author and his stout-hearted wife.

Disraeli in his "Curiosities of Literature" relates many incidents of successful authorship that are similar to this. Misfortune has been the parent of many books.

HOUSE AND FARM.

Farming Notes.

The Indiana farmer says that the statute in reference to the sale of adulterated milk is violated in Indianapolis not less than 500 times a day, and that the fines, if collected, would amount to $25,000 per day.

Dairymen say that a cow should be capable of producing 200 pounds of butter annually, in order to be profitable. It is believed, however, that the average yield per annum of milch cows does not exceed 150 pounds.

Where is the individual who has passed any time in the country that does not remember aunties' or grandmothers' Horehound tea when a sudden cold has placed them on the sick list? This plant is a perennial herb, with a strong aromatic smell, and a bitter pungent taste. It is a tonic, and is useful in asthma; and a favorite remedy in pulmonary complaints, entering largely into the composition of coughs, syrups and lozengers. It will thrive in any soil, but is stronger if grown on light, poor land. Always let it be represented in the vegetable garden.

Cotton-seed oil is largely used both here and in Europe as a substitute for lard, and it is steadily growing in favor. It is estimated that our production of lard is about 1,000,000 tierces a year, and that of cotton-seed oil 400,000 tierces; but only about one-fifth of the spare seed is now pressed for oil, and, owing to imperfect machinery, a large proportion of the oil remains in the cake, so that with improved machinery, more capital and greater enterprise in the South at least 2,000,000 tierces of oil may be produced at an early day.

Oil Cake Meal For Horses.

But very few know anything of the value of oil cake meal for horses. Its use in fitting fine bred cattle has long been common and its value fully appreciated. The same can be said of swine, for no food will cause a pig to gain and put him in show condition so speedily as oil cake meal, giving him a glossiness of coat not obtainable so well in any other way. What oil cake will do for cattle and pigs it will do equally for horses. A horse appearing to be bound up, as this term is understood in the stable, can, by the use of this feed, be relieved of this condition as promptly as by turning out to grass, involving none of the contingencies which attend the latter, the full strength and vigor being maintained in the meantime. Nothing so quickly improves the coat of a horse as the use of a little oil cake incorporated with feed, while turning out to grass in sun and rain fades and roughens the hair in a week's time. In addition to this, oil cake loosens the bowels, the degree to which this is done being entirely under control, while the effect from a run on grass is entirely a matter of chance.—Live Stock Journal.

To Prevent Hens from Sitting.

Do not drench them in water nor put them in a barrel with one or two inches of water in the bottom, nor tie them up by one leg to a tree, nor any of these cruel practices which our fathers in their ignorance used to quench the natural instinct; but take them from their nests, put them in a large coop in the open air, under a shady tree, if the weather is warm, and feed largely with everything, including baked beans, that you give to your laying hens. In many cases the fowl commences to sit when she is in good condition to keep on laying eggs, if can but get the notion out of her head that she must be a clucking mother. She needs, perhaps, the material for egg shells, which may be easily supplied. Furthermore she should not be put in a small coop, where she would not obtain exercise; better put her in a pen having no floor, but loose earth, where she may scratch for a living. Activity will tend to the forgetfulness of the sitting fever or desire to sit. It is well to provide for social activity, and to this end a cock may be introduced to a pen where sitting hens are kept. He will talk with his own language, scratch with the would-be sisters, and soon eggs will be found, when you may be sure that the time has come for freedom.—Poultry Journal.

Currants and Gooseberries.

The currant is a very useful fruit, and generally does not receive the respect to which it is entitled. It is found in most gardens, but in the majority is left to itself—to live or die bear or be barren. Not so, however, with those who fully realize that it is really one of our best and most useful fruits. It is best propagated by cuttings ten or twelve inches long, of the last season's growth. These cuttings should be cut just below their union with the old wood, all the buds from the portion put under ground, and two, or perhaps three buds left above the ground. Set about half the cutting into the ground. The setting should be done in early spring. Have the soil deep and mellow, and it should be rich. Set a foot apart in the row, and make the rows two feet apart. Transplant in the spring following in rows wide enough apart to allow cultivation with the plough, and the plants should be three feet apart in the row. Keep the three-year-old branches cut away. Trim and shorten annually. Every half dozen years the rows will need renewing.

The propagation of the gooseberry is similar to that of the currant. But it requires a deeper soil than the currant, for it is a very gross feeder. Gregg recommends a trench two feet deep, the bottom to be covered with a heavy dressing of fresh stable manure. The rows should be five feet apart, and the plants three feet apart in a row. Keep the roots clear of shoots, trim to a single stem, from twelve to thirty inches high. Keep the head well thinned out, "but do not cut off the ends of new shoots." The best remedy for mildew—the chief difficulty with this plant—is high, open culture, free manuring and a copious mulching, says an authority. Sawdust or spent tan bark is recommended for a mulch, applied to a depth of from four to six inches. Also hay, or other material, sprinkled with salt is recommended. Ashes sprinkled on when the dew is on is said to have a good effect upon the fruit to prevent mildew. There is one alleged remedy, however, that is very beneficial on the bush, even if it does not do as much as is claimed to prevent mildew, and that is frequent sprinkling with soap suds in the spring. A New Jersey grower recommends the following for mildew: Remove the dirt from about the roots, thickly mulch with salted meadow hay, and then cover again with earth.—Western Rural.

The Garden.

Farmers often draw the line between farm and garden work with too much distinction. They work in the garden when they can't work in the field, and thus make the garden of secondary importance, while, considering the value to the family of fresh garden vegetables, it should stand on an equality, at least, with the farm. We do not advise following in the old rut of planting the same vegetables in the same places every year; rotation is as necessary in the garden as in the field, and we would have more of the work done with horse and cultivator, as might be, if seeds were sown in rows at a proper distance apart. In small gardens where the cultivator cannot be used, the beds should be arranged so that a hand cultivator may take its place. A few flowers in the garden make it very attractive.

An Unshod Horse.

The Bath (Me.) Times says: "A gentleman at the South End has a horse which he has owned nine years and never had a shoe on its foot. He thinks the advantages are viz; that in damp snow the horses hoof will not ball up and he is sure of his footing. Second, that the horse never calks himself in deep snows, never wears out floors by stamping, and is never lame from having shoes that pinch the feet. He says that it usually costs $40 a year to shoe a family horse like his, so that in a financial point of view he saves $40 a year. The horse was seen this morning and was in good order; the hoofs were sharp and tough and smooth. He says that although having been in use nine years, he never yet met with an accident, not even so much as a stumble."

An American Girl Heard From.

From the Rural New Yorker.

I am another one of those girls who, like "Annie Winfrey," do not think housework so very charming. If the able writers who often take us for a subject would only say: "Get the girls interested in housekeeping," I could agree with them, for every girl should know how to keep and manage a house. Housekeeping means the management of domestic affairs which acquire great skill and judgment; and while it may be construed to mean a performance of many household labors it does not necessarily mean all the downright hard work of a house. But, instead of housekeeping, they say: "Get those girls interested in housework," which means all the work of the house, washing, ironing, scrubbing, cleaning, cooking, etc., and if we dare ever so faintly say we do not like this work they glare at us with open disapproval. Now, I think we girls are greatly abused. If you choose to look the country through I do not believe you can find one girl in a thousand sits down, leaving her mother to do the work alone.

Yet the papers of to-day teem with articles accusing us of not working. You can hardly find one of us who does not do all in her power to lighten her mother's work, and we deserve more credit than is given us for doing so much that is unpleasant. Not that housework is degrading, but hard and disagreeable. Still we do this work willingly and cheerfully because we consider it our duty and are interested in our labors to this extent, we know the work must be done and it is our place to do it and more satisfaction is given when work is done well than otherwise. This is not saying that we like the endless round of housework, and why should we? Why should we like to soak our hands in dish-water three times a day, steam ourselves over a wash-tub, scorch ourselves over the ironing-table and roast ourselves over a cook stove until our faces are scarlet, gradually deepening to a royal purple—a very beautiful color in its place but not often admired in the face. Are we vain because we do not like to do work that makes our hands rough and our faces coarse? To say nothing of backaches and weary limbs.

I wonder if there are many women who can truthfully say they would rather do housework than anything else?

To country girls housework frequently means, in addition to the above, feeding pigs and chickens, and sometimes even milking the cows, and always getting the vegetables from the garden, picking berries and hundreds of other things not thought of until they turn up to be done. In Mrs. Annie L. Jack's charming stories there is always at least one servant to do the drudgery. I can see how housework in that way could be made very pleasant, but doing it alone is a different thing. Perhaps not one of these writers who take us to task so often ever went into a kitchen and did the work week after week, year after year, or they would not think it so strange that we dislike it. Since considering this subject I have taken some pains to consult my girl friends who I know do a great deal of housework and have not found one who says she likes the work, still does it conscientiously and cheerfully.

Ofcourse I am speaking of people whose circumstances make it necessary for their women to do the work. If one can have plenty of servants I don't blame the girls for not going into the kitchen. There must be some way of learning to keep house well and doing housework in case of an emergency (such as marrying a poor man), without a lifetime of practical experience. There may be some girls in poor circumstances who let their mothers do the work in order to preserve their own beauty but I am sure they are few compared with the number of girls in the world. These few are probably so hardened that no advice can touch them; therefore why lecture and scold us all so often when so few are the sinners and they evidently beyond reform?

A lady writes: "Painful menstruation was the bane of my life. I dreaded those feelings of bearing down and that pain in the side and loins. Of late I got in the habit of using Dr. Grysott's Yellow Dock and Sarsaparilla. It goes right to the spot, gives me strength and frees me from all pain. I think it is worth its weight in gold."

End of the New York Season.

New York Special.

The theatrical season is at an end. The actors are coming to town. Union Square will soon be thronged with the heroes of the stage. The failures of the season have been numerous, fully one-half of the 216 combinations that started out in September having joined the majority. Some of them possessed merit, some did not. The most successful combination this season was that playing the "Romany Rye." This melodrama was played to larger business than any other play ever produced. On May 12, the close of the season, the "Romany Rye" will have been presented for thirty-one weeks to audiences which paid in the aggregate $201,297, an unprecedented amount—about $6,500 a week. Although the salary list and expenses of the "Romany Rye" were great the managers must have realized a large amount of money. The Madison Square theater management have not yet made up their books for the season, but their traveling companies, twelve in number, all did well. Miss Mary Anderson met with great success, and has added over $100,000 to her already snug fortune. She will appear in England in a few months.

How the Human Organism Protects Itself.

The organism of the human body is a self-regulating apparatus. Even interruption of its moral functions excites a reaction against the disturbing cause. If a grain of caustic potash irritates the nerves of the palate, the salivary glands try to remove it by an increased secretion. The eye would wash it off by an immediate flow of tears. A larger quantity of the same substance could be swallowed only under the protest of the fauces, and the digestive organs would soon find means to eject it. The bronchial tubes promptly react against the obtrusion of the foreign substances. The sting of an insect causes an involuntary twitching of the epidermis. If a thorn or splinter fastens itself under the skin, suppuration prepares the way for its removal. If the stomach be overloaded with food, it revolts against further digestion.

These automatic agencies of the organism generally suffice to counteract the disturbing cause, and the sensory symptoms attending the process of reconstruction constitute merely a plea for non-interference. The suppurating tissues push the thorn outward, and resent only a pressure in the opposite direction. The eye volunteers to rid itself of the sand dust, but remonstrates against friction. The rum-soaked system of the toper undertakes to eliminate the poison, and only asks that the consequences of the outrage be not aggravated by its repetition. But if that plea remains unheeded, it finally takes the form of the emphatic protest we call disease. For, even in its urgent manifestations, the reaction against a violation of Nature's health is a cry for peace, rather than a petition for active assistance in the form of medication. "Accustom yourself in all your little pains and aches," says Jennings, "and also in your grave and more distressing affections, to regard the movement concerned in them in a friendly aspect—designed for and tending to the removal of a difficulty of whose existence you were before unaware, and which, if suffered to remain and accumulate, might prove the destruction of the house you live in—and that, instead of its needing to be 'cured,' it is itself a curative operation; and that what should be called disease lies back of the symptoms which, in fact, are made for the express purpose of removing the real disorder or difficulty."—[From "The Remedies of Nature," by Dr. Felix L. Oswald, in Popular Science Monthly.

Beecher has written a letter to Mr. Barnum, in which he expresses the wish that he could go to a circus at least once a week.

The Wonderful Efficacy of
DR. SCHENCK'S MANDRAKE PILLS

Has been so frequently and satisfactorily proven that it seems almost superfluous to say anything more in their favor. The immense and constantly increasing demand for them, both in this and foreign countries, is the best evidence of their value. Their sale to-day in the United States is far greater than any other cathartic medicine. This demand is not spasmodic, it is regular and steady. It is not of to-day or yesterday, it is an increase that has been steadily growing for the last thirty-five years. What are the reasons for this great and growing demand?

Dr. Schenck's Mandrake Pills contain no mercury, and yet they act with wonderful effect upon the liver. They cleanse the stomach and bowels of all irritating matter, which, if allowed to remain, poisons the blood, and brings on Malaria, Chills and Fever, and many other diseases. They give health and strength to the digestive organs. They create appetite and give vigor to the whole system. They are in fact the medicine of all others which should be taken in times like the present, when malarial and other epidemics are raging, as they prepare the system to resist attacks of disease of every character.

Dr. Schenck's Mandrake Pills are sold by all druggists at 25c. per box, or sent by mail, postpaid, on receipt of price.

Dr. Schenck's Book on Consumption, Liver Complaint and Dyspepsia, in English or German, is sent free to all. Address Dr. J. H. SCHENCK & SON, Philadelphia, Pa.

NEW YORK'S GREAT BRIDGE.

The Opening This Month, of the Great Structure Which is to Unite New York and Brooklyn—Its Cost, Dimensions, Etc.

At last a day has been determined upon for the formal opening of the East River bridge connecting the city's of New York and Brooklyn. The action by the sub-committee naming Thursday, May 24, will be ratified, and the arrangements for the simple programme decided upon will be carried out. Invitations will be extended to the president and vice president and ex-president of the United States, to the Cabinet officers, the members of both houses of congress, the governor, Lieutenant governor and ex-governors of New York, to the governors of all the States and Territories in the Union, to the mayor and ex-mayor of New York city and Brooklyn, and to the leading officials of both cities. Inivtations will also be extended to the representatives of foreign powers in the country, to distinguished foreigners, to distinguished citizens and to representatives of the press in all parts of the Union. These only, together with those to whom passes may be issued, will have admission to the bridge on that day. The programme provides for the assembling of the invited guests in the main building at the entrance to the bridge on the Brooklyn side at 2 o'clock p. m. At 3 o'clock the bridge will be formally presented to the mayors of New York and Brooklyn by President Kingsley, of the Bridge Committee. Mayor Edson and Low will, it is presumed, make appropriate responses. This will be followed by an oration by the Rev. Dr. Storrs on behalf of Brooklyn, and another by the Hon. William M. Evarts on behalf of the city of New York. The guests will then fall in line and walk across the bridge to the New York side, and this will close the former exercises, though it is probable that in the evening the festivities of a banquet, usual to such occasions, will take place; but this is a part not known in the programme.

The Brooklyn Suspension bridge is one of the greatest triumphs of engineering skill. Conceived in the minds of a few capitalists of Brooklyn and New York in the closing year of the war, and stimulated by the success of the great bridge over the Ohio river between Cincinnati and Covington, completed in 1867, the engineer of the latter enterprise the late John A. Roebling, was consulted, and he pronounced in favor of the scheme, estimating its cost at $6,675,000. A company was thereupon formed and incorporated with a capital of $5,000,000, the charter also providing that the two cities might take the property at any stage of its progress by paying 33 1-2 per cent. more than its cost and guaranteeing that the bridge should be free. The provision was, in fact, carried into effect upon the completion of the foundations of the two towers, the city of Brooklyn assuming 66 2-3 per cent. of its cost, and the city of New York 33 1-3 per cent. John A. Roebling was appointed engineer, and work on the foundation of the main tower was begun on the Brooklyn side on the 2d of January, 1870. This tower was completed June 15, 1875. The caisson for the New York tower, 178 by 102 feet, was begun December 12, 1871. The depth of the foundation of the Brooklyn tower from high-water mark was 45 feet; that of the New York tower 78 feet. During this portion of the work, eighty-six cases of what was known as caisson fever occurred, three of which proved fatal. Engineer Roebling died from injuries received, before the first stone of the foundation was laid, and was succeeded by his son, Washington A. Roebling, who in 1871, was stricken down with caisson fever, but continued to direct the work from his sick-room. The first wire was run across the river from tower to tower May 29th 1877. In the first estimate of the cost of the bridge, the item of land necessarliy to be purchased was not taken into the account; including this, to the amount of $3,800,000, the original estimate of the cost was about $10,500,000, and it was thought that the work would be completed in five years' time.. On May 24th, the day of the formal opening, it will be just sixteen years since the work of preparing the plans first began, and thirteen years and nearly four months since ground was broken. The cost of the bridge to the present time has been over $15,500,000. The following dimensions of the various parts of the bridge will be of interest:

Length of river span, 1,595 feet six inches.

Length of each span, 930 feet.

Length of New York approach, 1,562 feet six inches.

Total length of bridge, 5,989 feet.

Width of bridge, 85 feet.

Number of cables, four.

Diameter of each cable, 15 3-4 inches.

Length of each single wire in cables, 3,578 feet six inches.

Ultimate strength of each cable, 12,000 tons.

Weight of wire, 12 feet per pound.

Each cable contains 5,296 parallel (not twisted) galvanized steel, oil-coated wires, closely wrapped to a solid cylinder 15 3-4 inches in diameter.

Weight of passengers that can be crowded upon the span, maximum estimate, 1,380 tons.

The revenues of the bridge will be derived from utilizing the arches of the towers for warehouses, for which purposes they have been especially constructed; and from the passage of vehicles, etc. Foot passengers, in accordance with the terms of the charter, will have free use of the bridge. Much work remains to be done to complete the minor details, but this will not delay the opening of the structure to public use. This bridge is one of the most stupendous and bold adventures of engineering skill that the world has yet seen, but its successful completion only paves the way for still greater enterprises.

The national debt reduction for the month just closed was but $2,851,402.65, against $9,344,826.27 for March, $7,630,678.59 for February, and $13,636,883.87 for January.

THE BANGING MANIA.

O, see the young girl,
In beauty rare,
Sans kink, sans curl—
Banging her hair!

And hear the young man,
At the piano there,
Hard as he can—
Banging his air!

A young mother stands
Oppressed with care,
With slipper in hands
Banging her heir!

A Commercial Traveler's Tale.

Old commercial travelers will tell you that in many respects the profession is nothing to what it was; though for our own part we are inclined to think that in many respects the profession has improved. The penny postage, the telegraph, the enormous expansion of the railway system, have wrought such changes in the mode of doing business between town and country that in the commercial rooms of country-town inns where in the "good old days" a score of gentlemen would have assembled of an evening, one nowadays meets but two or three. Much of its old character, also, has departed. Before the era of railways, when men and horses might be detained at an inn for days by stress of weather or badness of roads, jollity and free-and-easiness were a very prevailing characteristic of the commercial traveler and the reckless jollity of the fraternity—for a fraternity it was, almost masonic in the rigidity of its rights and the exactness of its etiquette—passed into a proverb.

But to our story. There happened to be a snug party of commercial gentlemen assembled in the commercial room of an inn in one of our quaint South country towns, one winter evening a few years ago. The cloth had been removed from the table, the customary toasts had been duly honored, and the company, some half-dozen in number, had drawn their chairs round the fire, lit their pipes, and each with his glass of grog at his elbow had evidently made up his mind to be as comfortable and as cosy as possible.

The conversation was being monopolized by Mr. Hicks, a vulgar, puffy-faced, bald-headed man, with a large expanse of shirt-front and much ostentatious jewelry, who was standing with his back to the fire, his hands tucked under his coat-tails in the orthodox British fashion. The other men, who were all younger, were listening with the respect due to a representative of the old school of commercials, hazarding occasionally an approving remark, dutifully laughing at every joke, but in no way interfering with the great man's periods.

"Ah!" he said, wrinkling his fat brow into a series of parallel creases, and gazing almost mournfully up at the ceiling, "traveling ain't what it was There ain't no fun nowadays. You young gents don't know what it means, for railroads have knocked it all on the 'ed. It was something I can tell you, to turn out of a warm bed at 4 o'clock of a winter's morning, and jump into the trap for a twenty-mile round before breakfast, so that the hopposition shouldn't get the start of you. Nowadays you jump into your train with your hulsters and your wraps and your mornin' paper, and you take your time over matters as can be. "You don't seem to have the spirit we had, though we worked and we had our fun, too, I can tell you. You work; but you don't seem to have no time for fun."

"In what way do you mean, sir?" asked the boldest of the audience.

"What way?" repeated the great man. "Why, I mean the dodges and larks we was up to."

"What sort of dodges and larks?" asked the other.

"Oh, all sorts!" replied the old gentleman. "There's so much humbuggin' etiquette about nowadays. It's what you call bad form for a gent to play a trick upon another. I've known all sorts o' things done. They used to hocus one another's drink, so as to make the hopposition sleep 'eavy the next morning; lock their doors on the outside; change their boots; tell the boots not to wake 'em until it was too late to do anything; and as we used to 'av rather wet nights in those days, I can tell you some of us required a power o' sleep to shake off the effects. It was considered fair and above-board to steal a march in any way upon a gent who was working in the same line; and there was much more hopposition then, although there may be more competition now; because, you see, such a lot's done by post and wire in these days. Why, look at me; I 'aven't been here for two years or more; but I know that when I go round to-morrow to see how the other traveler's been gettin' on, I shall get just as many orders as if I'd been reg'lar all that time. Not that all of my customers will know me; but they know the name of the firm—Hooker & Snooker, of Dowgate 'ill—all that's quite enough for 'em."

"And were you ever tricked in any of the ways you describe?" asked another young commercial.

"Me? me tricked? Not me. Joseph 'icks was too wide awake. No; I was never caught," replied the great man. "I once caught a fellow in the hact of taking the linch-pins out of my gig; but I soon stopped his game, I can tell you. That was at Charing—not Charing in London, but Charing between Canterbury and Maidstone."

"And did you ever play any tricks yourself?" asked the first young man who had spoken.

Mr. Hicks slowly turned himself towards the speaker, and winking his eye several times, replied: "I should just about think I did—many and many a one. And now you remind me, I'll just tell you about one I played."

Mr. Hicks, having toasted himself to his entire satisfaction, now condescended to let some of his companions see what the fire was like, settled himself slowly and ponderously down into the chair which, by prescriptive right, belonged to the senior traveler in the room, took a long sip at his grog, and, with a preliminary clearing of the throat, began:

"It was in 'forty-two,' and it's a strange thing, but it was in this very identical place. There was a cocky, stuck-up young fellow of the name of Brownsmith travelin' for Stokes & Nokes, Great Tower street, in the same line as mine. He 'adn't been 'ere afore, and didn't know who I was; so I says to myself, I'll just take a rise out o' you, my young popinjay; see if I don't."

At that moment the great man's narrative was interrupted by the entrance of a little old man dressed in black, who observing that the seats round the fire were occupied and that nobody offered to make room for him, sat down at a side table and commenced to write letters.

"Ahem!" said Mr. Hicks. "I beg your pardon, sir; but I was just agoing to begin a tale; but as I see you are busy I'll wait until you're finished."

"Not at all, not at all," said the stranger. "Pray, don't let me interrupt you; you won't disturb me, I assure you. In fact, I'm not sure that, not being a traveler, I ought not to apologize to you for coming into the commercial room; but the fact is the fire in the coffee-room has gone out, and the waiter said he thought you would not mind me coming in here."

"Quite welcome, sir, quite welcome," said Mr. Hicks with almost monarchical grandeur. "It's against custom, I know, for strangers to enter the commercial-room; but under the circumstances I don't think we'll mind. Will we gentlemen?"

The gentlemen chorused that they didn't mind; so the little man proceeded with his writing, and Mr. Hicks with his tale.

"Well, as I was saying, gents, I made up my mind to take this young Brownsmith down a peg or two. So what do you think I does? I goes to the stables, and I says to the hostler: 'Bill, if you'll get Mr. Brownsmith's cob and gig out of the way the first thing to-morrow morning, and when he orders them, say you are very sorry, but you've let them out to another gent by mistake, here's a sovereign for you.' Of course, it was worth a good deal more than a sovereign to me to get the young chap out of the way, for I saw he was pretty cute, and I knew he'd be after my customers. But that ain't all; for I knew it was the easiest thing in the world for him to hire another cob and gig until his own was returned. So I goes into the 'all very late that night, where all the bags was—in those days they were very much more alike than they are now, and used to be chalked with the numbers of their owners' rooms, to distinguish them—and I quitely rubs out his number and puts him on to another lot of bags, so that if he did start he'd find himself in a hole and no mistake. Next morning I was uncommonly haffable with him at breakfast, pretending, of course, not to know he was in the same line as me; and I starts off and does all my business. When I came back I found the poor young chap running about like a madman. He was satisfied that the gig business was a mistake; but when he came to find that another man had gone off with his bags, and had let him with a lot stuffed full of French frilling, I thought he'd have brought the 'ouse down. He got the landlord and the 'all porter, and the chambermaids and the waiters, and he threatened to have 'em up before the magistrate; and all the time I was grinnin' in my sleeve and pretendin' to be as concerned about it as any one."

"What 'appened? Well, I'll tell you," replied Mr. Hicks. "The gent who had taken Brownsmith's bags by mistake for his own 'ad gone off to 'astings, and there was nothing to do but to wait till he came back. And when the gent did come back, you can imagine that there was a pretty row in the place, in which of course I joined, saying that it was a disgraceful thing, and threatening the landlord that I'd take my custom over to the other 'otel if better watch wasn't kept for the future. The poor young fellow took it very 'ard, he did; and when he got his gig and bags and went round the next morning and found that all the business had been done, he came back, and he sat down in that corner there, and told me it would ruin him, 'cause it was his first job for Stokes & Nokes, and he was on trial."

"Me sorry?" said Mr. Hicks with contempt. "Not me. All's fair in love, war, and commerce; and if I hadn't done it, he'd have done me by cutting me out of a lot o' business. As it was, I never set eye on him again, and I've 'eard he got the sack from Stokes & Nokes. Sorry? Not me!"

There was an expression on the faces of some of the young men as they thought it was rather a low trick; but they made no remarks, and after some further conversation a general yawning and knocking out of pipes and draining of glasses proclaimed the hour of bed. So the great Mr. Hicks took up his candle and departed; his example was quickly followed by the rest, and the little old gentleman who had been writing his letters was left alone.

When the door had closed upon the last bed-goer he shut up his writing-case and took up the position in front of the fire lately occupied by Mr. Hicks. Something in the story he had heard seemed to tickle his fancy immensely; for he stood there chuckling to himself and rubbing his hands as in great glee. "Clever chap that! Uncommonly clever chap!" he muttered to himself. "He's quite right. Young Brownsmith did give up traveling; and if he hadn't he wouldn't be one of the richest men in the country as he is now."

He rang the bell for the waiter. When the man appeared the little old fellow said: "What time does Mr. Hicks start upon business in the mornings?"

"Well, I 'ardly know, sir," replied the waiter. "You see, he don't come here reg'lar—in fact, I can't call to mind hever 'avin' seen him before. But the gents mostly goes out about 10 o clock."

"Tell the boots to call me at 7, will you?" said the old gentleman; and taking his candle, he went to bed.

The next forenoon Mr. Hicks sauntered majestically forth from the inn upon a round of visits; and as he walked along he seemed absorbed in the contemplation of his own figure in the shop-windows, as if anticipating with no small degree of pleasure the sensation such a representative of Hooker & Snooker would make in the shops of the humble tradesmen. He entered the establishment of Mr. Willow, who said upon his door that he was patronized by the Royal Family, but assuredly not to a fifth part of the manner in which he was patronized by Mr. Hicks.

"Anything in our way, Mr. Willow?" said the great man condescendingly, "Hooker & Snooker, you know?"

"Nothing for Hooker & Snooker," replied Mr. Willow solemnly.

"Nothing, Mr. Willow, nothing? Are you quite sure?" asked Mr. Hicks somewhat astonished.

"I've said nothing, I think," said Mr. Willow. "I'm busy. Please go away, there's a good man."

"No: nothing at all. Good morning,": put in Mr. Burslem. so that there was nothing to be done but to return the wish ruefully and to go out.

"Now there is something wrong," said Mr. Hicks to himself as he stood on the pavement outside Mr. Burslem's door. "My two best customers and no orders! I never knew it before, never! Who can it be? Young Jones was here two months back and got forty pounds odd in orders. And I, Joseph Hicks, the chief traveler to Hooker & Snooker, am told that there's nothing for me! My good man, too, forsooth! I must try Mr. Cole."

He entered Mr. Cole's shop. Mr. Cole was not there, but appeared in a few minutes. Mr. Hicks went through his formula. Mr. Cole replied immediately "Not to-day, Hooker & Snooker. I am supplied."

"Supplied!" almost shrieked Mr. Hicks.

"Yes, supplied!" said Mr. Cole, but not a syllable more.

Mr. Hicks left the shop slowly and wonderingly. "Surely," he thought, as he waddled on to his next customer, "surely no one's been interfering with Hooker & Snooker. No orders from Willow! It's unaccountable."

He entered the shop of Mr. Burslem, who, not being patronized by Royalty, preferred not to be patronized by any one, and who had the reputation of being a curt, sharp, short man of business. Mr. Hicks entered, and, on the principle that time is money, did not detail his business, merely indicated the name of Hooker & Snooker, and stood with his order-book ready open.

"Nothing at all, my good man," said Mr. Burslem, "nothing at all. Good morning!"

"Nothing at—" began Mr. Hicks, fairly bewildered.

Mr. Hicks was now fairly roused. Suddenly, the recollection of his tale in the commercial room on the preceding evening flashed before him. Could some of the young fellows have been playing him a trick similar in nature to that which he had played so many years before on young Brownsmith? Stifling his anger and mortification as best he could he strode on to the shop of his last customer, Mr. Ironstone.

"Nothing to-day, Hooker & Snooker," said Mr. Ironstone, before Mr. Hicks could put the question.

"Mr. Ironstone," said the astonished Hicks, in an almost pathetic tone of appeal, "will you tell me if any one has been here before me and has done the business which hitherto Hooker & Snooker have performed for you?"

"Hooker & Snooker still do our business," said Mr. Ironstone.

"Well, but I represent 'em," said Mr. Hicks.

"Come come," said the dealer soothingly as if he were speaking to a child; "don't take up my time; there's a good fellow. I've told you that I have no orders, so go go away quietly, or I shall be obliged to call your keeper."

"My what? My keeper!" roared Mr. Hicks. "What do you mean sir? Surely you don't think I am a lunatic?"

"I don't think it; I know it," replied Mr. Ironstone, and coming round the counter, he gently took Mr. Hicks by the arm led him from the shop, and shut the door after him.

Mr. Hicks stood as one dazed for some seconds. The buildings seemed to reel around him, and he felt that with a little more he would actually be out of his mind. Then he strode back to the inn, resolved to make a terrible example of the plotters that evening.

He was very moody and silent at dinner, and the young fellows saw that something had gone wrong with him, as he scowled terribly over his food, and only answered with fierce grunts the questions put to him. Afterward, when, according to custom, the chairs were drawn round the fire and the best part of the day begun, Mr. Hicks rose majestically and assuming his usual position in front of the fire, prefaced his thunders with a loud "Ahem!"

"Gentleman, it is with regret, strongly mixed with disgust, that I am forced to address you upon a certain subject—upon a subject which is as disagreeable to me as it must be humilating to such of you as are concerned. In short, some of you, taking a mean advantage of my attempt to amuse you last night, 'ave been playing me a undr'and trick."

He continued: "The day for that sort of thing has gone by, and it ill becomes members of an honored profession to indulge in tricks of which a schoolboy would be ashamed. To be plain with you, gentlemen, I have been passed off in the town as a lunatic, and consequently have found the doors of my most important customers shut against me."

In spite of the serious manner in which Mr. Hicks spoke there was a very perceptible snigger on the faces of the young men around him, which he was not slow to observe.

"I see nothing to laugh at in it, gentlemen," he continued, suppressing with difficulty his rising wrath; "in fact, there are some of you who will probably have very good reasons for regrettin' it when I tell you that. unless I find out which of you is the offender, I shall write to your respective governors with a view of having the matter thoroughly gone into."

One and all declared that they were utterly ignorant of the matter, and with such energetic protestations against the iniquity of the trick, that Mr. Hicks was forced to believe them.

"Perhaps the little old gentleman who was writing at the side table last night knows something about it," suggested one of the accused.

Mr. Hicks rang the bell for the waiter. "Waiter," he said, "is the gentleman who came in here from the coffee-room last night in the 'ouse?"

"Mr. Brownsmith, sir—O, no, sir; he went away this mornin'; and he gave me this note to give to you, not before this evenin'," replied the waiter.

"Mr. Brownsmith! Is that his name?" cried Hicks, in a faint voice.

"Yes, sir," answered the waiter. "He owns half the town, sir, and was here looking after his property."

Mr. Hicks opened the note and read as follows:

My Dear Sir: You were good enough, some forty years ago, to play me a trick which might have ruined any other man for life, or at least have retarded his progress very seriously. I am not very vindictive; but I never forgave you for it, more especially as I have had no opportunity of repaying you, We are at last quits. You are beyond the reach of actual harm now, as I presume you have feathered your nest pretty comfortably in forty years; but as a man is never too old to learn a lesson, I hope by the return trick I have played you this morning that you have learned one. I am, sir, your obedient servant, Ignorance of Mexicans as to Common Matters.

There are some peculiar qualities of the Mexican mind which will, for a while, stand in the way of quick progress. Thus, very few of them will buy their railroad tickets until the train is in full view of the station, and, until a short time ago, preferred paying their cash to the conductor. They have an incomprehensible itching to defer any enterprise, or even trivial work, until the morrow. Where these defects of their disposition and training are understood, and patience and management are exercised, a fair service can be got out of them. As exemplifying how little Mexicans know of the rights of common carriers, the other day, when Gen. Diaz stopped here, the company, as a courtesy, tendered the municipality the use of their cars for the general's party. Thereupon the city authorities undertook to let everybody have a free ride, and until the matter was legally explained to them, threatened the railway people. These mistakes of the Mexicans in their dealing with our people spring not so much from a desire to annoy as from ignorance.—Monterey, (Mex.) Correspondence New York Sun.

Mr. Labouchere has a remarkable libel suit on his hands, the court of queen's bench having just granted a rule nisi for a criminal information against him, at the instance of the Duke of Vallambrosa. In the course of an article about society at Cannes, published when Mr. Gladstone was stopping there, Mr. Labouchere expressed his general contempt for the duke of Vallambrosa, whose father, he said, was nearly hanged because, when he was an army contractor in the French service, he supplied as meat to a French army corps the flesh of soldiers who had died in hospitals, or who had been killed in battle. It is said that Mr. Labouchere, if forced to a defense, will plead the truth of this statement

Mirrors are let into the door panels, and the whole suite can be lighted either by candles or by electricity.

COLUMBIA SALMON.

Great Prosperity of Fisheries—Wholesale Destruction of Fish.

A letter in the San Francisco Chronicle from Portland Oregon, says: Salmon fishing will begin about April 20. It seldom begins before that time, because the run is very light, and there being more floating-snags and drift-wood in the river than at any other time, the nets are easily destroyed. The season lasts four months. A boat, net and signal-light cost from $400 to $600. There is a general disposition to center the salmon-canning business at that ancient little town, as it seems to be the cheapest place of operations, for if the fisheries were further up the Columbia tug-boats would have to be employed to bring back the fishing-boats. Yet the lower bay at the mouth of the Columbia is very stormy during the fishing season during which there is often loss of life and a great deal of danger and hardship. This is one reason the Columbia salmon cost more than the Sacramento salmon.

Fishermen who have their own boat and nets are paid 60 cents a salmon weighing eight pounds. Those whose boats are furnished by the company are paid 45 cents a salmon. One of the firm has raised the price to 70 cents a fish but the others refuse to see the elevation. Salmon are packed in one-pound cans and 48 cans make a case, the average price of a case being $5 or $5.20. The product of the 36 canneries on the Columbia river last year was 535,000 cases, worth $2,782,000. It is estimated that the capital invested in these canneries is about $2,000,000. When it is known that fishing-boats cost $500 or $600 each, and that some of the fishing firms have 100 boats, and that a total of about 7,000 men are employed the cost can readily be understood. About one-third of the salmon product is shipped to San Francisco for reshipment to Australia, the Eastern States, and islands in the Pacific ocean. The remainder is shipped from Astoria to Liverpol or London. One vessel recently left with 70,000 cases worth $350,000, the most valuable cargo of salmon ever shipped from the Pacific coast.

The continued run of salmon in the Columbia is remarkable, considering the great destruction of fish by traps and the merciless iron wheels that impale them like Spanish garote. There is a sentiment in abolishing this wholesale destruction of fish, and it is likely that a law will be passed prohibiting it. The law against fishing between Saturday night and Monday morning is not rigidly enforced. This law was passed in order to allow the fish to ascend to their spawning grounds. But in this wholesale and untimely destruction the people are destroying the very source of their revenue. It is proposed by the cannery proprietors to establish a hatchery. Some "public spirited" people think the state should establish a hatchery for the benefit of cannery establishments. Yet the canneries have year after year, packed from 400,000 to 535,000 cases, depending solely on the fish that escape to their natural spawning grounds. It can easily be estimated what a future awaits this growing industry when a hatchery has been established able to turn out millions of fish annually, and their wholesale destruction stopped. Perhaps then 2,000,000 cases might be packed which would be a of 10,000,000 about one-fourth of which would be net. During the fifteen years the revenue derived from fishing in the Columbia river was about $25,000,000. There were 860,000 cases of salmon packed on the Pacific coast last year, the value of which was $4,300,000. This would leave 300,000 cases for canneries outside of the Columbia river. When salmon fishing began here fifteen years ago the price was about three times what it is now, or $15 a case. If the wholesale destruction of fish is not stopped, and hatcheries are not soon established, the supply will soon be like the last run of shad, and the price will advance. But there is considerable salmon fishing in Alaska, three canneries being in existence there, and recent reports refer to the establishment of another

The "scooping" wheels, upon which salmon are caught, resemble the old-fashioned "undershot wheel." They are built upon embankments or protecting rock, so that the wheel will be in the water when the stream rises. Of course, they are built in the low-water season. The wheels have plank paddles so that the water running down stream sets the wheel in motion, and the salmon coming up stream are caught on the wheel and literally broken. They fall into a "chute," something like a wood-drive and slide down into boxes. A wheel scoops up 3,000 or 4,000 salmon a night. There is no law to prevent this wholesale slaughter and destruction, but there is a loud cry for it.

Taken From Life.

About forty years ago a handsome young Frenchman was at the head of an aristocratic French school on the Staten Island Hights, just back of Brighton. Among his pupils was the daughter of the haughty Bigelow family, then prominent in New York society. To reduce a two-volume romance to a paragraph, I can only say that the French professor fell in love with Miss Bigelow, and she vowed she would rather die and take her chances in the other world than to live without him. Her parents opposed and threatened, and there were terrible times in the social circles of New York and Staten Island. Finally the lovers settled the difficulty by getting married. Miss Bigelow was disinherited. Two lovely cherubs—brother and sister—were the result of the marriage, and for once love ran smoothly after marriage. Nothing, however, is certain in this illusive life; both father and mother fell ill and died very suddenly. The two little orphans were taken to Boston and educated by wealthy relatives of the family.

The girl grew up to independence and struck out for herself. She became a teacher, and for several years was Professor of Elocution in Vassar College. Her brother also disliked to be a burden to his relatives, and when the war broke out he enlisted in the artillery service and went away to fight for glory and $20 a month. Not getting killed he was able to return and participate in the ways of peace. In due time he found himself at the head of a big manufacturing business in the enterprising city of Chicago. He was also engaged to an accomplished young lady, and cupid sharpened his arrows at her door. Prosperity seemed to have a mortgage on their future, and all was going well until the great fire reduced everything to ashes. The flames were bursting from the roof when the young man reached his house. He saved but one thing; it was a large painting of his mother. He buried it in the garden amid showers of cinders. Then extinguishing his clothes which were on fire, he drove to another house a mile away, reaching it in time to recue his sweetheart. Their marriage soon followed.

I have long been interested in the career of this young man. First he was an engineer; then a journalist; then a miner in the lofty mountains in the San Juan country; then an expert in Mexico for a Wall street syndicate, and at last he found a responsible position in a wealthy powder company. He was very successful, and he went out to superintend the blasting of some iron mines in Pennsylvania. To show the superiority of his own powder over dynamite he used both compounds. The dynamite exploded prematurely, and when we stood by his coffin Columbus avenue, Boston, it seemed pitiful that among all the people in this great world a life so young and full of promise should be snuffed out like a candle. This death of William A. Le Row—so sudden, so unnecessary—is another proof of the treacherous, terrible power of dynamite.—Washington Capital

A Story With a Great Deal of Life In It.

The departments were just beginning to disgore the great slices of humanity that they had swallowed in the morning. I was standing by one of the great piles as the men and women began to come out slowly at first. The first two or three, warned by experience, had umbrellas, under which they went jogging slowly home at a clerk's gait. The fourth was a woman in widow's clothing—rather shabby clothing which had been worn a long time. She was thin, shrunken, gray and pale, and seemed broken with a weight of bad years—a sad memory of better days. The carriage of the secretary was rolling to and fro before the big entrance of the building. His gray whiskered colored coachman with difficulty restrained his blooded horses. The secretary was signing his name a great many times on a great many different documents in his lofty, velvety office. He might be out in a minute. He might not be out for an hour. Just as the ghostly widow came slowly down the big steps the fine old coachman turned his prancing pair toward the entrance. The poor old gentlewoman came down to the sidewalk with an evident difficulty which spoke of rheumatism. She was perplexed and puzzled by the unexpected rainstorm. She had no umbrella, and I don't believe she had car fare. The black angel on the secretary's carriage spied her as she stood in the pouring rain, and recognized under all time's disguises the features her fashionable friends had not seen for years. It's wonderful what sharp eyes these good old colored "uncles" and "mommies" have. He drove up to the curb at once and leaning over on his perch invited the poor puzzled woman to get into the secretary's carriage and ride home. Without a thought of the consequences to the faithful old fool on the box she murmured her address, fortunately near at hand, and sank back luxuriously on the cushions of the handsome carriage. Taking all the risks the fine old fellow drove carefully yet quickly to the shabby boarding-house, and was back long before the secretary was ready for him. I would never have known had the loyal old servant not told me that the widow's husband was a general who was famous when the secretary was unknown, although I could have been quite sure that old Thomas drove her carriage when she had one.—Washington Correspondence Philadelphia Record.

An Artist's Delicate Hint.

The New York correspondent of the Washington Capital writes that Mr. Healey had, some time since, as a subject for a portrait, a young southern lady, who came to his studio so bedizzened with paint and powder that every characteristic line was obliterated. Mr. Healy, of course, was in a dilemma. He could not order the girl to go and wash her face. He would lose his commission, and he is too polite a gentleman. He could not lay the same paint on canvas that there was on her face; it would not be satisfactory to the family. When the sketch was lined in he rose from his seat, sat down beside his subject, and kindly asked her if she was feeling as well as usual. Surprised, of course, she replied that she was. "But, Miss Jones, you walked from your hotel, did you not?" "Yes." "And you came hurriedly up-stairs, without stopping to rest?" "Why, yes, of course." "Ah, yes, Miss Jones, but you see, though you may not be feverish, you have exerted yourself so severely that there is so much color in your face that I fear it would mislead me. Now, to-morrow, if you will be good, please bathe your cheeks in cold water the last thing, come in a close carriage, and stop and rest yourself upon the sofa you will find on each landing. In that way I am sure we shall have no more trouble." His speech had the desired effect. The faint flush on her face when she came the next day was perfectly natural, and did not at all retard the picture.

Langtry And Her Freddy.

Ramdsell writes from Washington: "Freddy with Mrs. Langtry is simply a convenience. He is devoted; he is handy to have around; he furnishes her houses; he is always ready to serve her; he walks with her; he sits with her; he is her company. If he makes her presents of costly gems and squanders his great fortune on her, it is none of my business, for she is not robbing me. If she and he are satisfied, and the neglected Mr. Langtry does not complain, what business is it of ours? It helps the jewelers, and they are a very deserving class, even if they do make enormous profits on their wares. Freddy, when I saw him, was dressed like a young New York gentleman of fortune and leisure—a tall silk hat, not too new, a black cutaway coat and vest to match, and close trowsers of mixed black and gray. His shoes were pointed at the toes and tightly laced. His necktie was a white, or nearly white scarf, held by a handsome pin.. In his hands he carried a silver-headed cane and a pair of gloves. When he went into the street he lighted a cigar and strolled gracefully and leisurely up the avenue."

NEPENTHE.

The north wind follows free and fills
Our rounding sail, and overhead
Deepens the rainless blue, and red
The sunset burns on quarried hills;

And peace is over all, as deep
As where, amid the secular gloom
Of some far-reaching, rock-built tomb,
The nameless generations sleep;

While, undecayed as on the day
That saw them first, the kings of old,
In sculptured calm serene, behold
The slow millenniums pass away.

Still, far behind us, as we cleave
Smooth-flowing Nile, the din of life
And passionate voices of the strife
Are hushed to silence, and we leave

The cares that haunt us, dark regret
For wasted years, and wild unrest,
Yearning for praise or pleasure, blest
With life's last blessing—to forget.

For still in Egypt's kindly air,
Strong antidote of mortal woes,
The painless herb, Nepenthe, grows,
Which she whom fair-haired Leda bare

Mixed in the wine, and stilled their pain
Who wept in Spartan halls for sire
Or brother, wrapped in funeral fire,
Or wandering o'er the boundless main.

A NIGHT OF ADVENTURE.

It was a hot, weary morning at the far end of the London season. There were not very many carriages left in the park or the streets; yet Zoe Conington, one of the greatest beauties in society, was driving down dusty Oxford street. And she crying, quietly, beneath the parasol, which she held well over her eyes. Presently the carriage turned up one of the substantial side streets, and stopped in front of a very neat and prosperous-looking house. The door was painted a dark green, and on it was a brass plate, bearing this inscription: "Mr. Edgar's Home for Trained Nurses." Mrs. Conington quickly left her carriage, rang the bell at the door, and was immediately admitted. She was shown into the "office," where she found Mr. Edgar and his lady superintendent, both apparently very busy at large writing tables.

"I want a nurse, Mr. Edgar," said Zoe Conington rather helplessly. She knew her eyes were red, and she did not like the feeling.

"Certainly," said Mr. Edgar; "what sort of case?"

"It is for my sister," said Zoe. "I really don't understand what's the matter. They say she has what they call anæmia, and the doctor who attends her fears she will not live long. I believe he is an old fogey, and does not understand the case."

"Then you want a nurse of experience?" said Mr. Edgar.

"Exactly," said Zoe eagerly, "and I should be so glad if I could have one that is ladylike as well—not a common hospital nurse. You see my sister is quite alone, without any lady friend, and I can't go to her because her husband doesn't like me."

"Nurse Harcourt," said Mr. Edgar to the lady superintendent, who nodded and rang a bell. "She is exactly what you want, he added, turning to Zoe. "She is an experienced and clever nurse, and she is a lady. We don't have many like her. She belongs to a good family. I feel sure you will like her. Come in, Miss Harcourt," as the nurse thus named entered. "This lady wants you to go to her sister."

"What is the case, sir?" said Nurse Harcourt.

"It is said to be anæmia."

"I can undertake that, I think, sir."

"Of course you can," put in the lady superintendent.

Zoe had quickly taken in the girl's appearance. She was slender, active, with an intelligent and interesting face. Her features were not good, yet there was a charm of color about her. She had large and very dark eyes, and strong dark eyebrows: while her thick hair, cut quite short, was all bright with warm gold and red. This certainly was not Zoe's idea of a "common hospital nurse."

"I don't know whether I ought to say so," said she to the nurse, "but I don't think the doctor understands the case. Have you often nursed anæmia?"

"Yes; in the hospital," said Nurse Harcourt; "and I have had cases since in which it was present. I don't think I should be easily deceived in it."

"Then you must have my address," said Zoe; "and write or telegraph to me direct, as you think fit. If there is any mistake being made in the treatment, I will send down a physician at once. Will you undertake this?"

"Yes," said Nurse Harcourt with a quick, bright smile; 'I think I can undertake that. Shall I get ready, sir?"

'What station' asked Mr. Edgar, armed with an 'A. B. C.' and a magnificent glass.

'Lostayvil,' said Zoe, 'somewhere near Penzance—a wretched little river fishing-place. People ought not to go so far away from everybody. Is there any chance of her getting there to-night?'

"Lostayvil—oh, yes; she can get there at 10. The train starts in half an hour. She must have some sandwiches made up to take with her," he said to the Lady Superintendent, who rose and hurried away, pen in hand, to give orders.

Mrs. Conington drove to a telegraph office, and sent a "wire" to her brother in law: From Zoe Conington, Hyde Park Gate, to Edward Mertoun, The Old Hall, Lostayvil. Your account of Agatha has alarmed me exceedingly. I am sending her a nurse, as I think it may be a comfort. She will arrive at the Lostayvil station about 10. If you cannot send for her, she will find some conveyance."

Nurse Harcourt, dressed all in gray, and with a gray veil over her bright hair and clever face, caught the express, and took her seat without any fuss or excitement, although she had only half an hour to get ready to reach the station. When she arrived at Lostayville it was a clear, sweet night; the station seemed to stand alone on a fragrant and indistinct desert, with no sign of any houses near.

"Is there anything come to fetch me from the Old Hall?" asked she, in her clear, determined young voice.

"Nothing at all, miss," said the solitary porter, and then, after a second's pause, during which he shouldered her box, "so I suppose ye'll go to the hotel."

"No, indeed," said Ada, who immediately suspected him of being in the pay of that same hotel, "I must go to the Old Hall to-night. I suppose I can get something to drive in?"

"There's post-horses at the hotel," said the porter dubiously.

"Take me there, then," said Ada. It seemed to her that she walked about a mile and a half after him over a lonely road. At last they arrived at an inn entrance around which there were some signs of sleepy village life. After a stern interview with the dull landlord, Ada succeeded in getting him to have out a "po'shay" and two horses for her. A driver was extracted from the bar where he was drinking; he came out surly, and, getting on the box after Ada and her luggage had been waiting some time in the "shay," began to whip the horses. This amusement he continued to indulge in until they arrived at the Old Hall, taking the horses, at a rapid gallop, up hill and down dale.

The Old Hall stood high, with a wide lawn about it, dotted by clumps of fine trees. On the way Ada was charmed by glimpses of the winding silver stream and the wooded hills about it. All was very lovely; yet something in the aspect of the Old Hall made her shiver as she approached it. It was very dark; only one window seemed dimly lit; the front door appeared to be hermetically sealed. But Ada courageously rang and knocked and while she waited for an answer, filled up the time by paying her surly driver the fabulous sum he demanded of her. At last the door moved; it opened slowly, and on the steps stood a tall man.

"Are you the nurse?" he said.

"Yes," answered Ada.

The coachman whipped up his horses in the familiar style, and rattled away. A servant who looked like a groom came out and lifted Ada's box into the hall. A lamp stood on a table there, and by its light Ada tried to discover what sort of house she was in. She was standing in a big, old-fashioned hall or house-place. Opposite her, his hands deeply buried in his pocket, stood the man who was evidently master.

"'I told the maid to get a room ready for you,' he said. "'The man shall light you up there, and you can see my wife in the morning. Shall he bring you some supper?'"

"'If you please,'" said Ada. "'First I'll go to my patient at once.'"

"Nonsense!" said Mr. Mertoun; "'you must sleep after a journey.'"

"'But it is my duty to see her first, if you please, sir.'"

Ada followed the man servant up stairs to a little bedroom, where he left her, saying he would [illegible] When he came back she said: [illegible] Mr. Mertoun downstairs?"

"He's gone to his own room," said the groom; "and he says missus is asleep and not to be disturbed."

"Which is her room?" asked Ada. "I must know, because I've come down to nurse her."

"I'll show you the door," said the man. He led her a little way along a corridor, and pointed up a short staircase. "The door on the left," he said, and immediately hurried off, carrying his light with him.

"This is a queer house," thought Ada. However, she found her way back to her own room by the glimmer of light from its doorway. Then, taking her candle, she went straight to the door of the room the man had shown her. She knocked gently; there was no answer. So she quietly turned the handle and looked in. A solitary candle lit a large room; she could but dimly perceive that on the bed lay a woman who, seeing her, started up as if in terror, and then fell helplessly back again. Evidently this was the sick room. Ada shut the door, put down her candle, and approached the bed.

"Don't be frightened," she said: "I am a nurse your sister sent down to take care of you."

"I thought you were a spirit," said Agatha Mertoun; "I have had strange visions to-day." Then she relapsed into a silence, and seemed to forget Ada's presence. After awhile she spoke again. "I am dying," she said.

Ada went close to her and looked into her eyes. They were very strange. Suddenly the unhappy woman was seized with a violent sickness. Ada, with her quick wits, noticed some things which made her wonder. When her patient, weary and exhausted, lay back again on her pillow, she began to make a tour of the room. There were a great many bottles in different places. She took out all the corks and smelled at the contents. Suddenly while thus engaged, she happened to look toward the bed, and met Agatha's eyes fixed on her with a gaze full of some extraordinary meaning or intelligence. It almost frightened even the brave Ada. She put down the bottle quickly and went to the bedside. But Agatha had closed her eyes, as if too weak to keep them open. Looking earnestly at her, Nurse Harcourt realized how wonderfully lovely she was, in spite of the deathly pallor which lay on her face. Suddenly the sickness came again; and then a violent spasm.

"This is a queer sort of anæmia," said Ada to herself; and, after a long look at her patient, began to smell at the physic bottles. Just then she heard a faint sound at the door. Hastily approaching it, and opening it, she saw Mr. Mertoun disappearing through the opposite door. "He wanted to watch me," she thought. "Now, what on earth can this mean?" She locked the door inside, and continued her investigations. Suddenly she came upon a bottle inside a cupboard, nearly empty, the smell from which almost made her cry out. But she remembered her patient and refrained. She merely put the bottle into her pocket, and then, without hunting about any more, went back to watch poor Agatha. The color of her face grew steadily worse, and her weakness was rapidly increasing.

"What on earth am I to do!" exclaimed Nurse Harcourt at last, "in this out-of-the-way place? I can't see her die before my eyes. If I could only get the doctor?"

She had spoken out loud, thinking Agatha quite unconscious. But she was not. She opened her eyes and seemed to express something by their earnest gaze. It seemed as if she understood Ada's words.

"It's the only thing to be done, I believe," said Ada to herself; "and I'll do it." She took out her watch and looked at it—half-past three. Going to the window, she drew the curtain a little aside. There was a faint gray haze all over the world; but the light would be enough to find one's way by, and every moment brought the dawn nearer. "If I did but know the way," she thought. "Well, I must wake someone up and ask it."

Having made up her mind, she no longer hesitated. She took a final survey of her patient and then left the room. She locked the door on the outside, and took the key with her. Quickly entering her own room, she caught up her gray cloak and traveling hat, and put them on as she hurried down stairs. "If I only knew where the servants sleep!" she thought; "but I'm so afraid of rousing Mr. Mertoun. I'll wake up some cottage people."

With some considerable difficulty she opened she opened the front door, and then drew it close behind her without absolutely shutting it. To her delight she found it would stay so without moving; this would enable her to enter the house again quietly. As quickly as swift feet would carry her she hurried out of the grounds. She saw no cottage; so she went on along the widest road, hoping to reach some habitation in time. To her delight she saw at last a hedger and ditcher trudging away to his work. She ran after him and, almost breathless with her quick movement and excitement, caught him by the arm while she asked him her question.

"The doctor?" he replied. "Right on till the cross-roads, then to the right; not more'n a mile."

Not more than a mile! Nurse Harcourt started on her way gleefully. That soon would be accomplished, she thought. Had she but known how strange is the Cornish mind on the subject of distances, she might have stayed to ask further information. But, instead, she hurried away, leaving the workingman to stare after her in complete and bewildered amazement. The cross roads were reached before long, and then she turned to the right and hurried quickly along the lonely road.

At last Ada began to reflect on the fact that she must have walked a great deal more than a mile since her meeting with the hedger and ditcher. In fact, she was beginning to feel a little puzzled and hopeless, for there was no sign of houses. Still she hurried on, hoping to meet some one else who would direct her. Suddenly on her ear fell the sound of laughter—high, clear, hearty laughter. Odd, at this time in the morning; but, nevertheless, the sound encouraged her. It came again and again, and guided her footsteps out of the high road into a wonderfully quiet lane. The laughter still went on ahead, like a mocking spirit, as a will-o'-the-wisp. But suddenly Ada found herself close to a little cottage, every window of which was brilliantly illuminated from within. The lower windows reached to the ground and stood open, exhibiting all the signs of a late revel. Empty decanters and bottles, innumerable glasses, some packs of cards on the floor—these things caught Ada's quick eye and made her wonder; while leaning on the gate of the cottage was an extremely handsome young man dressed in white flannels. He looked at Ada with the steady gaze of astonishment. He was immensely surprised at the sight of a young lady in gray, with an extremely charming face, taking a walk at 4 o'clock on a misty morning. Without a second's hesitation she approached him.

"Can you tell me where I can find the doctor's house?" she said, "a man I met told me to come this way."

Her earnest tone seemed to rouse him and make him understand that she was out on business.

"Dr Frere is the nearest resident doctor," he said, "and he lives about six miles off, over there," pointing the way Ada had come. "But if there's anything I can do, let me help you. I am a doctor."

"You?" said Ada, her gaze wandering from his sun-burned face, which had on it the unmistakable up-all-night expression, to his white flannel-clad figure, and then to the cottage beyond, which looked so absurd, in the growing daylight, with a quantity of dying candles burning on the tables.

"It's all right," he said, seeming to understand her perplexity. "I'm Alan Browne of Wimpole street. I'm down here for the boating, and I've been having a bachelor party. Didn't you hear that fellow laughing as he went out off just now? I had to get four of the others to take him away."

"I know your name," said Ada earnestly. "Come with me. I am the nurse from Mr. Edgar's home. I'm in charge of Mrs. Mertoun up at the hall, and she's dying. If you don't come at once it may be too late."

"What's the matter?" said Dr. Browne. "I've got a pocket medicine case here; shall I bring it?"

Nurse Harcourt leaned on the gate and said something in a scarcely audible voice; then she took out the bottle from her pocket, and held it up for his inspection.

"Impossible!" he exclaimed.

"Come and save her," said Ada, solemnly. Dr. Browne turned, hurried into the cottage, and in little more than a minute reappeared with a small case in his hand. Seeing him ready to follow her, Ada immediately started off as quickly as possible on her return road. Alan Browne hurried after her, leaving the little cottage, with all its windows open and its candles burning to show its disorder to any passer-by who might chance to wander that way.

"You are a very good walker," said Dr. Browne, when he had got up with her.

"I believe I am," said Ada, and went quickly on without any further remark.

These two, going swiftly through the pale, ghost-like morning mist, would have looked strange to any one who could have seen them. [illegible] Nurse Harcourt was white with excitement and fatigue, although she did not know it, nor knew that she was weary. She was intent upon returning to her charge; she was full of anxiety as to what might have happened in her absence.

"You know," said Dr. Browne presently, "this thing can't be possible. She is a noted beauty; the men that stay in Lostayvil go to church to look at her. Who could do such a thing?"

"I can't say, sir," said Ada; "but I don't think I am mistaken."

Dr. Browne was so bewildered by the unwonted manner of her introduction to him that he forgot that this vision of the morning was a nurse; but Ada remembered her position, and addressed him with the manner she used in sick rooms—quiet, but having in it an odd mixture of defiance and deference.

Very little more passed between them; they walked so quickly that it was not easy to talk. Dr. Browne covertly observed his companion very earnestly.

As they reached the gates of the Hall the stable clock struck five, and the gray mist was beginning to lift a little and glide away like the ghost of the dawn. It had been a strange walk, though neither thought of it at the time; but it had the effect of making them feel as if they had known each other for years. The house was not awake yet; all was just as Ada had left it. She gently pushed open the front door and led the way into the dark interior. Up the dark staircase the two crept, like thieves. The blinds were all closed, and only a faint glimmer of light came in through the chinks here and there. As the gray figure and the white figure came noiselessly up the staircase, suddenly something started from the door of Mrs. Mertoun's room, and, with a horrible cry, rushed across the landing. It was the cry of a most awful fear. It made Ada feel sick, and she longed to sit down on the stairs, for her legs gave way beneath her. But she would not. She remembered her patient, and getting out the key of the room, opened the door and let Dr. Browne in; then closed it behind them, and locked it. Agatha Mertoun lay rigid, like a lovely statue, on the bed. Her eyes were staring and fixed, and on her lips was a foam. Nurse Harcourt looked at her with a sinking heart. Was it too late? But she quickly threw aside her cloak, and prepared to wait upon Dr. Browne, who soon became absorbed in his task. He used strong measures, and watched their effect with anxiety. Nurse Harcourt saw, with a curious sort of satisfaction, that he was acting upon the same idea with regard to the case which she had offered him. He did not reject it as impossible now. For two hours this fixed attention continued; neither left the bedside.

At last, Dr. Browne went to the window and beckoned Ada to him.

"The servants will be up now," he said; "ask them to get you some coffee. You look perfectly worn out."

"I believe I am rather tired," she said; "but I was right, wasn't I?"

"Quite right," he said; "and you have saved her life by your pluck."

Thus comforted, Ada went away in search of the servants. On the landing outside the door she found the man servant whom she had seen the night before. He was standing still, with a face full of perplexity.

"Nurse," he said, "I believe master's gone out of his mind. He has been queer for some time past, but not like this."

"What is it?" asked Ada.

"He is sitting on the bed laughing; and then every now and then he stops, and shrieks out suddenly that the house is full of gray and white ghosts. I don't like it—it's awful!"

Then Ada remembered that cry of fear. "He must have seen me bring in Dr. Browne early this morning," she said; "he is in his boating flannels. Mrs. Mertoun was much worse in the night and I went for a doctor. Dr. Browne had better see your master.

The man looked a good deal bewildered, but recovered himself sufficiently to agree, and Dr. Browne heard his tale. While the servant was gone he turned to Ada and began—"You know the house better than I do—perhaps you can tell me—"

"Better than you do!" exclaimed Ada; "not much. I only got here last night at 11."

"Last night at 11!" repeated Dr. Browne. "Why, what a night of adventure you have had! No wonder you look worn out. Well, can you tell me who to send to, because there is evidently something very wrong here?"

"Yes, I can tell you that," she answered. "I have the address of Mrs. Mertoun's sister, who sent me down, and to whom I was to telegraph if necessary."

"That is all right," said Dr. Browne; "have you ordered any breakfast?"

"Not yet," she answered.

"I will send the man to see that it is got ready for you, and brought to your room. Now go straight to bed."

"Thank you, sir," said Ada, "but how can I leave Mrs. Mertoun."

"I am not going away just yet; you know I did not travel from town yesterday. I will have her attended to; and you shall be called in four hours."

"Thank you, sir," said Ada again; and went away down the now sunlit staircase, on which her room opened.

"Thank you, sir," repeated Dr. Browne to himself, "What an extraordinary little woman it is! And what eyes! By Jove, it has been a night of adventure."

Ada got into bed, drank some warm coffee, and then fell suddenly into a deep, dreamless sleep. It was the repose of complete weariness. Four hours later the maid knocked at her door; Ada started up broad awake in an instant, and as fresh as a flower. In a very short time she was dressed and at the door of her patient's room. The maid was in charge; Dr. Browne had left her with instructions what to do, and Mrs. Mertoun seemed to be a little better. Agatha was lying on a heap of pillows, looking very white, and wild and strange. But she was evidently in less suffering.

"My dear little nurse," she whispered when Ada bent over her. "I know you have saved my life. They will not tell me where my husband is, but you will. Is he mad?"

"I don't know anything," said Ada. "I have been asleep all this time."

"He must be," she went on. "I am sure he was not in his right mind or he would never have attempted what he did—you believe me, don't you? He loved me, when he was himself; but sometimes he had awful fits of jealousy, when I have thought before now that he would try to kill me. It was in one of those fits that he brought me here; and it has been growing on him. When we were married I was thought a beauty; and he was always fancying I should get tired of him. Oh, nurse, I am sure he was not in his right mind. You will tell the doctor so, won't you?"

"Yes, yes, I will,' said Ada, "and indeed I think so; I should have said so in any case. And the servants told my this morning that he was not in his right mind.'

"Ah! then it will be all right," said Agatha, with a sigh of relief. Ada understood then that this beautiful woman still loved the husband who had attempted her life, and that her great dread was lest he should be held accountable for his attempted crime.

Late that night Zoe Conington arrived with her husband; they brought with them a "mental" attendant, who immediately took entire charge of Edward Mertoun. The dreadful thing which Ada had discovered and prevented was kept a secret among the few who knew of it.

Every day, after Zoe arrived, Agatha insisted that her dear little nurse, as she always called Ada, should go for a walk. The country around the Old Hall was exceedingly beautiful; to wander about in it was the keenest pleasure possible to the country-born girl. Zoe did all she could to make her happy, but she found that nothing pleased her so much as the fresh air and the wild flowers. But Zoe one day carried a great piece of gossip to her sister's sick-room.

"My dear," she said, "I know now why nurse Ada is so fond of the field. Dr. Browne meets her. They will be telling us they are engaged soon!"

And so they did. One day they came in together with a conscious look of guilt. Dr. Browne says that when he asked Ada a question which girls reply to generally in either a sentimental or a scornful manner. Ada merely said, "Thank you, sik."—[The Waitehal Review.

A Colored Tragedienne Coming.

Brooklyn Eagle: I wonder who has the colored tragedienne in charge? Some astute dramatic genius certainly has designs upon the purses of theater-goers, for he has been working up this lady, whose name is Henriette Vinton Davis of Washington, for nearly two years. The first time I heard of her was from a New Orleans cotton broker. He described her as the budding dramatic genius of the African race. Had he ever seen her? No, but he knew all about her. She was studying hard under a competent dramatic instructor. She is a superb looking mulatto, with remarkably handsome eyes and graceful movements. She is intelligent and gifted with a voice of singular sweetness, has genuine tragic fire and a strong liking for the stage. She has been carefully puffed, and now the announcement of her performance has come out. She is to play Juliet, Julia, Hester Grazebrook, Rosalind and [illegible] Romeo to her Juliet?

THE ROMANCE OF THE CARPET.

Basking in peace in the warm spring sun,
South Hill smiled upon Burlington.
The breath of May! and the day was fair,
And the bright motes danced in the balmy air,
And the sunlight gleamed where the restless breeze
Kissed the fragrant bloom on the apple trees.
His beardless cheek with a smile was spanned
As he stood with a carriage whip in his hand;
And he laughed as he doffed his bob-tailed coat,
And the echoing folds of the carpet smote;
And she smiled as she leaned on her busy mop,
And she said she would tell him when to stop.
So he pounded away till the dinner bell
Gave him a little breathing spell.
But he sighed when the kitchen clock struck one,
And she said the carpet wasn't done.
But he lovingly put in his biggest licks,
And pounded like mad till the clock struck six.
And she said, in a dubious kind of way,
That she guessed he could finish it up next day.
Then all that day, and the next day too,
The fuzz from the dirtless carpet flew.
And she'd give it a look at eventide,
And say, "Now beat on the other side."
And the new days came as the old days went,
And the landlord came for his regular rent.
And the neighbors laughed at the tireless broom,
And his face was shadowed with clouds of gloom,
Till at last, one cheerless winter day,
He kicked at the carpet and slid away
Over the fence and down the street,
Speeding away with footsteps fleet.
And never again the morning sun
Smiled at him beating his carpet drum.
And South Hill often said with a yawn,
"Where has the carpet martyr gone?"

Years twice twenty had come and passed,
And the carpet swayed in the autumn blast,
For never yet since that bright spring-time
Had it ever been taken down from the line.
Over the fence a gray-haired man
Cautiously clim, clome, clem, clum, clamb.
He found him a stick in the old wood-pile,
And he gathered it up with a sad, grim smile.
A flush passed over his face forlorn
As he gazed at the carpet tattered and torn.
And he hit it a most resounding whack,
Till the startled air gave his echoes back.
And out of the window a white face leaned,
And a palsied hand the pale face screened.
She knew his face, she gasped and sighed,
"A little more on the under side."
Right down on the ground his stick he throwed,
And he shivered and said, "Well, I am blowed!"
And he turned away with a heart full sore;
And he never was seen not none no more.

HOME AND HOUSEHOLD.

House Decorations.

Every year the artistic fitting and furnishing of dwelling houses is receiving more and more attention. Artists of highest rank are engaged in designing, and most skilled workmen in making the papers, carpets, and furniture which are placed on sale all over our land. The best place in a parlor for surface decoration is the ceiling, for the reason that the wall and floor are more or less covered. As to the latter, it does not seem consistent with either good taste or good common sense to place our finest ornaments under foot, or when, in order that we or our guests may see and admire it, it shall be necessary to be of a downcast countenance or to have to shift the position of the furniture that the strong points of our carpets may not have been made in vain. As to the walls, they are, in this room, little more than backgrounds for our pictures, ornaments, etc., and should be treated as such. There is not much room for display of ornamentation on them without detracting from the effect of what we have hung or placed upon them. The ceiling has another advantage as a place for decoration—that it is seen as an entirety of the whole; and as our parlors are most used by gas-light or other artificial light, the ceiling is the best lighted surface in the room, having fewer shadows and a more direct light than the walls have. As a rule, avoid too dark a paper for the room; most dark papers absorb light much more than lighter ones do, and even the richer colors in dark tones appear dingy unless brilliantly lighted, while the lighter tints are often improved by artificial light. Above all things, do not fall into the vulgar error of trying to match paper to the carpet by getting them as nearly of the same color as is possible. This mistake is often met with in houses where the taste and refinement of the occupants would lead one to expect better things. One more caution, and we will proceed with our example. Do not use papers that are structural—i. e., those designs that have a built-up appearance—in parlors, such as tile patterns, or those which have strongly marked features, as well defined trellises or lines. This description of design is very well in its proper place, but not in the parlor, where the wall decoration should be secondary to what is placed on the wall; all pronounced features or lines tend to lead the eye to look for their termination. Never put a pattern on the parlor wall that has detached figures, such as the spotty gilt papers of bygone years, which were tolerable sometimes when seen in the roll; but their lonely little buds or leaves, repeated at intervals over an entire wall, produces a distracting tendency in the viewer toward arithmetical calculation. Avoid all papers of the bouquet sort, for the reason that your wall should present the appearance of a soft blending of harmonious colors, and not a picture often bad enough when seen alone, but infinitely worse than repeated, perhaps hundreds of times. Use very little gilt. The ground of the wall paper may be old ivory color or cream, or a very pale pearl. Recollect that light papers often appear much more intense after being hung because of the reflection of the opposite wall. This is especially so near the corners. It is well not to forget this, as it is very important that the walls be not too intense in color. They should be very light and clear-looking, but must not be so colorless as to be free from all expression. Let us, for the sake of example, suppose that the ground is an old ivory color, which is a clear, transparent color that is often found on Japanese porcelain, with a design in a delicate shade of greenish gray, something like the under side of the willow leaf; but this tint must be delicate, just sufficiently pronounced to be easily distinguished; but great care must be used in selecting, lest the colors have a hard and scratchy look. As for the kind of design, there are several that would look well, provided the color is what it ought to be. These are slender and graceful scroll patterns of the Greek style of ornament, in slightly darker shade than the ground, with or without a little gold. Be careful about using gold on delicate papers. It takes very little gold to spoil the effect. The gold attracts too much attention, thus preventing the delicacy which we desire. The scroll should be slender in form, and should be large enough to display its curves well. Small-figured patterns of this discription are very suitable for bed chambers, but a parlor paper in this style should be large enough to have expression and grace. But it should not be heavy or massive in the least; or, if one prefer a more naturalistic treatment, there are very suitable ones made now, whose pattern consists of slender vines, whose leaves and stems are gracefully entwined so as to form a very pleasing effect of two or three subdued colors. I would not advise the use of papers with bright shades of color or much gold; indeed, I should prefer a paper without gold. Two or three tints are enough for parlor walls, especially when it is desired that the effect be light and delicate—two or three shades of light buff, shading a soft vellum color to a light tint that is very clear and a very light cream or very pale turquoise tint or cream, or any cool color. Avoid lavenders and pinks, which are never satisfactory for parlors and are apt to fade. Papers that are all blue are too chilly and hard-looking.

In most houses the dining room is second only in importance to the parlor, consequently the decoration is to be most carefully considered. The dining room should not be as bright as the parlor, and yet it should not be dull in its appearance. Its decoration should be suggestive of what is sometimes called "solid comfort," but it may be treated with great elegance. A dining room may be as rich as a parlor, but should be different in its richness—dark olives, dark Indian reds or rich browns, enriched with lighter or brighter color and gilding. If the wall paper be olive in its prevailing color, a brown or maroon shade will look well. Let the frieze be of good width, and with olive wall and brown or maroon dado; a frieze in wood color, with light and dark olives and browns; soft, rich, low-toned reds, etc., and gold, if there be gold in the paper. But the best effects for the dining room are those in color without gold.

The hall decoration is important, because it is the frontispiece, the introduction, as it were, to the house. It should be inviting, but rather plain and simple, not being a room, but the entrance to the rooms. The hall and stairway should be covered with some simple figured paper, a geometrical or tile design preferred. Flowers do not seem appropriate to the severe dignity of an entrance. The lower part of the wall should be covered with a dado of dark or serviceable color. The walls may be light or dark, but the hall should always be much darker than the parlor opening into it. The wall paper should be in two or three shades of the same color—dull rich red or leather color preferred.

The library is not a room for much display. It should be very comfortable and unadorned. There is generally not very much wall exposed, so that where there is should be of some very soft, quiet color. The frieze may be of classical figures, or of the processional description in simple and few colors.

The walls of the sitting room may be rich and dark, if there be plenty of light in the room; or, if it be a dark room, one may indulge in light and delicate hues. The frieze should be one that will not tire on acquaintance; it should be of proper width, and bright and cheerful.

Bedrooms should be rather bright, but of small, neat figure as to the wall paper, full of quiet and restful repose.

Kitchen Keramics.

Apricot pudding is made in the form of a roly-poly. Make a crust as for baking-powder biscuit, then, after soaking and stewing the dried apricots, spread them thickly over the crust; roll it up and steam it for an hour; before soaking the apricots, wash them; do this as quickly as possible; then the water you pour over may be kept, as much of the sweetness and flavor will be washed out.

Rhubarb pies are much improved if baked in a very slow oven. If great care is taken in wetting the edges of the crust and pressing them together, the rhubarb need not first be stewed, but may be put raw in the crust. If a little flour is mixed with the sugar used in the pies, it will thicken the juice and keep it from running out over the top of the pie.

A light and very delicate pudding is made by beating six tablespoonfuls of cornstarch with six eggs, a half a teaspoonful of salt, a quart and a pint of sweet milk, sugar and flavoring to suit your taste. Heat the milk and then stir the cornstarch, etc., gradually in. It is quickly made, and if served with vanilla flavored cream is delicious.

A good way to make tarts is to roll the dough thin; cut the bottoms of the tarts with a biscuit cutter; for the top cut in the same way, only with something round about the size of a pepper box cover, cut out one piece. After they are baked, lay the jelly on the bottom piece, and then put the ring made in the way mentioned on it.

A good sauce for apricot pudding is made of one tablespoonful of butter, two of flour, a cup of sugar, hot water to thin it, and a few drops of almond extract to flavor it; let it come to a boil, and let it simmer for a few minutes.

When buying tin covers for kettles be sure that they have rings of wire at the top, instead of flat handles soldered on, as these will not last any perceptible length of time, and the cover must then be thrown aside.

When making pies of dried pumpkin put the pumpkin to soak the day before the pies are wanted. Soak it in sweet milk; rub it through a sieve or colander, so that there will be no lumps.

Household Hints.

Here are directions for making at least two boys happy: Knit from old or new scarlet yarn strips about two inches wide in garter stitch, and long enough for lines, then knit strips to go over the shoulders, and across the breast fasten two strips, on these two sew a few little gilt bells; very small and soft-toned ones are not objectionable if rung in the house on a rainy day, and in the yard they are a delight. This harness is transferable, as it is elastic, and is a constant source of pleasure.

A suitable covering for the home-made cornice of unpainted wood is made of the wide-fringed border that is used for the edge of burlap mats. The figures in some of the border are of blue or scarlet; if you cannot procure this you can work the outline of the figures with single zephyr of any color you please.

If the unfortunate mover on May day finds that her curtains are too long for different windows, let her not dispair and cut them off, but fold them over on the right side at the top, and sew the rings on where the curtains are doubled. They look handsome in this way, and there is no waste.

In place of the old-time stair rod to hold the stair carpet in place, a pretty and equally effective way is to fasten securely down with brass pins with round, flat heads. They are new and successful, and are not open to the objection that they will not fit any or all stairs.

An elegant plaque can be made at comparatively small expense; for a foundation get a wooden plaque the size of a large dining plate. This is to be covered with hunter's green velvet or plush, and on it in ribbon embroidery should be worked a bouquet of roses.

A brush broom case that is useful and ornamental also is made by covering a pasteboard cut in the form of a broom with silesia, and covering it with a crocheted cover; a ribbon handle to hang it by is a necessity.

A pretty beading for the top of a muslin curtain is made by hemming each edge of a strip of muslin and gathering it in two places, so that there shall be a puff in the center and a ruffle on each edge.

Tacks with nickel-plated heads are pretty to fasten lambrequins of macrame to the bracket or shelf to which they are to be attached.

THE DENCHFIELD PATENT.

The United States supreme court has just decided the celebrated case regarding the Denchfield patents, which has been pushed by the millers for years. The decision sustains the millers and declares the patents invalid. The decision rehearses the history of the litigation and the various steps taken by both parties, the main points of which are as follows:

The 20th of April, 1858, there was issued to John Denchfield of Oswego, N. Y., letters patent of the United States for an improvement in cooling and drying meal. Most readers perhaps are sufficiently familiar with the process of milling to know that after the grain is ground it falls into a conveyer, whence it is taken in elevators to the cooling-room or cooler, where it is cooled previous to being bolted. Difficulty had been experienced by heat caused by grinding and steam charged with dust. Denchfield's idea was to overcome these difficulties by drawing the steam and fine dust away from the grain and stones, and blowing it into a settling chamber in the upper part of the mill, whence the collected flour dust was returned to the elevator or cooler by a screw conveyer, where it was deposited in a condition fit for bolting. His claim in his original patent covered the combination of the upper and lower conveyers, the elevator, fan, and air spout with the millstone. But little use was made of the invention contained in the original patent. Denchfield sold licenses to use it to a few millers in Oswego at about $25 a mill. He afterward sold the right of the State of Michigan. The patent was reissued in Denchfield's name the 16th of January, 1872, thirteen years and eight months after the date of the original patent. In the reissued patent the upper conveyer, by which the collected flour-dust was returned to the cooler, was entirely ignored and the patent so drawn as to cover broadly the application of the suction fan for removing the steam and light flour dust from the millstones and conveyer. Previous to the date of the reissue many millers in various parts of the country applied a suction-fan for withdrawing the steam from their millstones; but, as they did not use the proper settling chamber and conveyer, they did not infringe the original Denchfield patent. By the change introduced in the patent on the reissue, all these millers became infringers. Naturally, under these circumstances, when demands were made for royalty by the parties who purchased the patent from Denchfield the millers "kicked" and united to contest the validity of the patent.

In the spring of 1874 suit was commenced by James W. Herring and others of Syracuse, N. Y., the then owners of the patent, against Page, Carrington & Co., of Fulton, N. Y., for infringement of the patent. This is the suit which has recently been decided by the supreme court of the United States on appeal from a decision in the United States circuit court for the Northern district of New York. The case was argued before United States Judge Johnson, in Utica, in March, 1876, by James D. Allen of Buffalo and Judge Comstock of Syracuse for the plaintiffs, and by the Hon. Henry R. Selden of Rochester for the defendants. The case was not decided until Sept. 10, 1877, when Judge Johnson filed an opinion sustaining the validity of the reissued patent, overruling the defendants' claim of prior use, and holding that the defendants had infringed. The case was referred to the Hon. Ward Hunt of Utica, to report to the court the damages, which the plaintiff had sustained by the infringement. Testimony was taken at great length before Mr. Hunt, who, on the 4th of March, 1878, reported that the defendants had saved by the use of their infringing device flour to the amount of one barrel on every 600 barrels made. He assessed the damages at $1,800, and a decree for that amount, with costs, was subsequently entered against the defendants. From this decree the defendants appealed, and after a delay of more than three years the appeal was finally heard by the supreme court. There are twenty suits pending in this district against various millers under this patent in which the Hon. George R. Selden is attorney for the defendants, and there are a very large number now pending in all sections of the West and Northwest.

TWO ANGELS.

Two glorious angels were at Nature's birth;
The one all light, with happy, radiant mien;
The other with her eyes upon the earth
In steady gaze—both thoughtful and serene.
She one was Hope—to work with ceaseless good,
The budding wish—the soul-centered will;
The other Patience—calming fiery blood,
Teaching to wait—"to suffer and be still."

And be ye ever with us, angels twain!
Oh thou with thy glad eyes and brilliant face!
And thou, still calmest in the hour of pain—
Who gildest sorrow with a holy grace!
Give us thy inspiration, smiling Hope!
Courage to work the good we may conceive.
Sweet Patience, teach us how with grief to cope,
To struggle on—to fall and yet believe.

CHURCHES AND CLERGYMEN.

Speculating Preachers.

"Considering the vigorous manner in which the ministers of this city have spoken out against speculation recently, it is rather surprising that any of their number should be engaged in what they term gambling, isn't it?" said a well known man about town to a Pittsburg Leader reporter. In reply, the writer said it would seem rather inconsistent, and at the same time remarked that he did not believe any Pittsburg preachers were guilty of anything so terrible—from an ecclesiastical standpoint—as stock gambling.

"Well, you come with me," said the first speaker, "and unless your sight is bad, you can see for yourself that what I have said is true." The invitation was accepted, and the reporter was taken to a place not far from the office of a well known-broker. It was near the time of the morning opening of the stock exchanges in Eastern and Western cities. Very soon a tall, clerical looking gentleman was observed walking briskly in the direction of the broker's office. The reporter recognized him as a gentleman of considerable wealth, who preaches for love of the work, and who has also written several pamphlets on religious subjects that have been gratuitously distributed. Without seeming to care whether he was watched or not, the reverend gentleman walked into the broker's office. The reporter and his companion followed a few moments later, and all doubt as to the object of the clergyman's business was dispelled by the anxious manner and apparent ease with which he translated the cipher quotations of the first call, as they were recorded by a "ticker" in the corner. After a few minutes a quotation came that was evidently pleasant, and, leaving the "ticker," the clerical gentleman consulted for a moment with the broker, the latter indited a telegram which was evidently an order to sell or buy certain stocks, and the customer walked out. The prying visitors, after making an excuse for their call, also left. When in the street the man-about-town said: "There, isn't it just as I told you? That preacher is one of the most inveterate stock speculators, or gamblers, if you choose, in the city. He is one of the first persons to inspect the opening and closing quotations in the morning and afternoon, and it is a dull day, indeed, that he has not a transaction of some kind on hand. I imagine that he is generally successful, too, for I have been watching him for some time, and he never seems gloomy." The reporter was somewhat dazed by what he had seen and heard, but determined to watch the religious speculator during the day. What had been said of him was verified in every particular. He did appear at the morning close and at the opening of the second call, and after each visit a telegram was sent East or West. There seemed to be no attempt on his part to conceal the nature of his business, and, as his voice has never been heard in denunciation of stock operations it is but just to presume that he differs honestly with his brethren of the cloth who believe business of this kind to be immoral on general principles. As the result of the day's experience a number of brokers were visited for the purpose of ascertaining, if possible, whether any other Pittsburg clergymen speculate. As was to have been expected, the brokers regarded the questions asked as impertinent, and refused to answer them. It was proved, however, that one other minister—a D. D., too—has a penchant for stock speculation, and not unfrequently dabbles in grain and other commodities. He is of the Methodist persuasion, and unlike the party mentioned above, resorts to what he doubtless considers an innocent subterfuge to conceal his interest. He is well known, and does not do his business through one office, but is a frequent visitor at several. He invariably says when he wants to make an investment: "Good morning, Mr. ——. Here is some money which a my friend has instructed me to invest in Pennsylvania stock (or grain, or whatever security or commodity may be named). You may just as well record the transaction in my name, however, it will be less trouble, you know," and then the D. D. will skip out, and talk about the degeneracy of the age or aid in dedicating some church, or laying a corner stone. He watches the market very closely, but has made a number of unfortunate investments. The brokers all consider his devotion to the interest of his friends very surprising, but never hint that they have any doubts concerning the existence of those friends. How many more speculators of this class might be found in the city if a still hunt were made is a matter of conjecture, but if brokers could be induced to talk some interesting secrets would doubtless be unfolded.

Evils of the M. E. Rotary System.

Observer: It is nothing very remarkable that two ministers of the Methodist church should leave that connection to join the Episcopal. In a body so vast as the Methodist, changes of base will frequently occur. But it is a sign when two respectable ministers, able to command good positions, should leave a church for the same reason, and that reason the itinerant system, the rotary system which has hitherto been the rule of the Methodist denomination. Various modifications have been made in that system from time to time, and it is apparent that more will be made as the church gathers strength, and becomes less distinctive in the habits of its membership. The plans that worked grandly in the earlier stages of church life are found to be less adapted to present conditions. It is, therefore, not strange that now and then one of the ministers wishes to change from being Methodist Episcopal to become Protestant Episcopal. This change is made without any reflection on the church or minister, and shows how loosely denominational ties hold the minds of some good men.

At the closing service of the mission in St. Patrick's church, New Haven, Conn., Sunday evening, one of the mission fathers asked all the men in the church, and there were about 1,600 of them, to repeat after him a pledge promising not to go into a saloon from 12 o'clock Saturday night till 12 o'clock Sunday night for one year. There was not a half dozen men in the church but who raised up their right hand and repeated the words after the priest.

A ROVING COMMISSION.

Spicy Gossip Relative to the Dakota Capital Commission—The Possibilities and Probabilities—Reportorial Pick Ups—Why Mike McDonald Visited St. Paul—Proposed Trade of Capital Pointers for an Irishman—Personnel of the Commission.

YANKTON, Special Correspondence, May 4.—Your correspondent left the capital commissioners snoring soundly in their special car, this morning, after having accompanied them a short distance on a grand tour of inspection of the proposed sites. The commissioners realize that their every act and utterance will be analyzed and criticized, and while it is evident that the individual sentiment of the nine elect has not yet crystalized into a general understanding of the plans and prejudices that will enter into the preliminaries of a final decision, it is equally evident that there is a determination to go slow and sure, and if possible make no mistakes. To do the commissioners justice it must be said that they are united in a determination to transact their business so fairly and well that their present critics and the people must accept and commend the final result. Your correspondent is aware from experience that intuitions are often very reliable, and while not making any claim of being on the inside or having received any pointers, or even of having believed all that he has heard, has arrived at conclusions that are worthy to be formulated into a prediction.

First, then, it may be predicted that after considerable secret discussion, and not without some opposition, a majority of the commission has decided to ignore the forty-sixth parallel and all other imaginary dividing lines, and to locate the capital with reference to accessibility and convenience to the people of the entire Territory as it now exists. This decision, from the start, is a death blow to the aspirations of Mitchell, which is considered too far south (only seventy-five miles distant from Yankton), and, besides, the commissioners have said to one another, "The 160 acres of land offered by Mitchell is not actually worth over $2,500 and is not conveniently located to the city. But what of Pierre? is asked. The reply is made in the language of a railroad manager: "We are not ready to go to Pierre, and it would cost us over $1,000,000 to extend our line to that point. It won't pay us." This narrows the contest down to Huron, Ordway, Redfield and Frankfort among the number having submitted propositions, and it may be safely predicted that the actual contest will rest between Huron and Ordway. Either town, it is alleged, will be satisfactory to the leading railroad companies. Three commissioners have already privately committed themselves to the friends of Huron, but the Ordway interest is thoroughly organized and powerful, and the towns in their immediate vicinity, which will include Forestburg and Redfield, making the proposition that will realize the largest sum for the Territory, is pretty sure of capturing the prize. This is an unprejudiced summing up of the present situation, and may be supplemented by the following reliable gossip, picked up on the fly and paragraphed for the PIONEER PRESS:

COMMISSION PARAGRAPHS.

Under the rule extending the time for opening bids until the 15th instant, supplementary bids will be in order, and may cut an important figure.

No one can ever guess from what town comes the unknown bid.

A Chicago & Northwestern representative accompanying the commission left for headquarters post haste, yesterday, on a mission to the general manager.

A detective, incognito, accompanies the commission, and picks up pointers for the Chicago & Northwestern road. He is of sandy complexion and lives in St. Paul.

Yankton is sure that Ordway is the place to be selected.

Huron, Mitchell, and all other candidates in or near the Jim River valley, want the capital to go to Pierre, as second choice.

A Mitchell real estate man was so confident at the time of the departure of the commission last night, that he offered to cover any money, from $1 to $1,000, any time within ten days, on a bet of two to one on Mitchell against the field.

It is predicted that an audience of 500 people will witness the opening of the bids.

The PIONEER PRESS recently intimated that the object of the visit of the notorious Mike McDonald to St. Paul was to work up a boom for Carter Harrison for vice president. Here is the real reason: Years ago one of the capital commissioners did not have as respectable a political following as at present, and a notorious three-card monte man once saved his life. Subsequently the monte sharp was one of two or three that were arrested by a Chicago, Milwaukee & St. Paul detective and lodged in jail at Red Wing. Mike McDonald recently became interested in the release of the monte sharp, and, coming to St. Paul, interviewed the capital commissioner, told him that said monte man had once saved the commissioner's life, and finally asked the commissioner to use his influence with him to secure his release, and that if he would do so said commissioner should get all the credit of the same as being an act of gratitude. In order to secure the release it was necessary to find an important witness in the person of an Irishman, who had been successfully secreted by the Chicago, Milwaukee & St. Paul detective after once having been discovered by a detective in the employ of Mike McDonald. This much preliminary. Last night a capital commissioner dropped down in a seat beside a detective in the employ of the Chicago, Milwaukee & St. Paul road, and after a brief conversation suddenly becoming innocent and confiding, pulled down his hat, put his arm around the detective and gently whispered, "By the way, where is Pat ——" (the important Irish witness). The detective straightened up and dropped his eyelid, and said: "Mike McDonald will never find him. He spent $2,000 looking for him at St. Paul and since, but a pointer on the capital location would not induce me to divulge his whereabouts."

The most prominent politician among the commissioners, and the one that undoubtedly has the brightest political future before him is the Hon. Alexander McKenzie of Bismarck. He is an untiring worker and never rests. He absorbs all the information afloat, and never yields any in return. Everybody who knows him is his friend. He appreciates friendship, and never tires working for his friends. He can quietly and unobtrusively pump dry the information and lay bare the plans of those with whom he comes in contact, at the rate of ten men per minute. He will ask a question of one person, and finding it unimportant, will walk away and interrogate three more individuals before a reply can be made. He is a magnificent organizer, shrewd, sharp, independent, reliable and always "gets there." The commission arrives at a town and comfortably establishes itself at some hotel headquarters, and McKenzie goes out on a skirmish. He will talk with everybody from a banker to a bootblack, and in an hour's time can go back and give to the commission a complete diagnosis of the capital fever. He can tell the symptoms and state of progress of every case. He knows just how hard the public pulse throbs with hope, and can accurately count the number that will not survive a disappointment. This saves the commissioners much labor and trouble and makes McKenzie a valuable member. He stands at the head of the line of North Dakota politicians, and can maintain his position just as long as he likes.

Commissioner Myers does not smoke or drink and has the appearance of a divinity student.

Commissioner De Long is the farmer member, and the stamp of honesty and integrity is so plainly marked on his countenance that a corruptionist would no more dare offer him a bribe than an Englishman would dare fool around an Irishman and a can of dynamite.

The commission as a body is anti constitutional convention, and does not endorse the political scheme that will assemble at Huron under the guise of a constitutional convention.

To afford immediate relief in asthma, try Dr. Jayne's Expectorant, which acts promptly by overcoming the spasmodic contraction of the wind tubes, and by causing the ejection of the mucus which clogs them. For whooping cough, croup and hoarseness, this medicine is equally beneficial; while for all pulmonary and bronchial disorders, it is both a palliative and a curative, and a sure and prompt remedy for all stubborn coughs and colds.

Polk County Journal.

CROOKSTON, · MINNESOTA.

The rigid measures enacted by congress for the exclusion of adulterated and spurious teas will not protect the country from tea adulteration without vigilant supervision of the trade in the United States. The importation of impure tea will hereafter be very difficult, f not wholly impossible, but there is a danger of adulteration after importation. It has been found that the manufacturer of spurious coffee berries from dough baked in moulds has become an extensive business, and the inexperienced shopper may purchase as pure coffee an article containing one-fourth part of such spurious berries. It is probable that unscrupulous dealers will resort to similar practices for the adulteration of tea. Dried leaves of various sorts and vile concoctions of indescribable character may be mixed with good tea, unless provision is made to prevent that result.

The exclusion of American pork from Germany on the pretext that it abounds in trichnia, if continued, will probably lead to retaliatory legislation which may be extremely injurious to German industry. There is no more trichnia in American than in German, or French, or English pork, and the object of excluding American pork from Germany is simply to protect the hog producers o that country, and if the action of the government were placed on that ground, our people would have no right to complain, as we reserve and exercise the privilege of protecting home industries. But if we should lay a duty on a leading German product, or prohibit it, as Germany has done, on the ground that it was not fit to be used, and was dangerous to the life of the people, then we would be guilty of an unfriendly and unjustifiable act. The matter is eliciting a great deal of discussion both in this country and in Germany, and will be likely to impair our hitherto cordial relations with that country.

Murder in Wisconsin.

Chippewa Falls, special: An inmate of the county poor house, named Hogan, escaped last week, and making his way to Big Bend, where his former wife, who had obtained a divorce, was married to a man by the name of DeCota, he proceeded to brain DeCota with a club. At the first blow he severed an ear, and at the second he crushed in his skull. The murderer is in custody.

A Vanderbilt Scheme.

The report that Vanderbilt is interesting himself in telegraphy is coupled with another to the effect that two o his friends are about starting a company with $20,000,000 bonds, and $10,000,000 stock. The proceeds from the bonds are to be used in constructing a complete telegraph system for the United States and Canada, and the stock is to be kept in the grip of the Vanderbilt family.

Raum's Successor.

Ex-Treasurer Gilfillan whose trust company in New York has gone to pieces, is talked of as the successor of Commissioner of Internal Revenue Raum. It is scarcely probable that he will come back to the treasury department, where his relations are not particularly pleasant. Secretary Folger thinks a New York man will be appointed, but Deputy Commissioner Rogers, who seems to have the bulk of Pennsylvania influence stands well in the race.

Texas Defaulting Paymaster.

No definite information has yet been received at the war department regarding the defalcation of Paymaster James R. Watson, in Texas. It is supposed that the shortage in his accounts wil amount to about $5,500, as shown by Col. Ferrel's examination and Watson's confession. He has been placed under arrest, but no court martial will be ordered until the department is fully and officially informed of all the circumstances. He was appointed from Iowa and commissioned paymaster, with the rank of major, Sept. 14, 1876. He was, at the close of the war, a private in Company B, Thirty-fourth Iowa cavalry. His bondsmen live in Iowa.

Weakening of Gladstone.

Bradlaughism has nearly proved the undoing of the Gladstone party in parliament. The issue on the affirmation bill was simply to give the infidel a chance to take his seat in the commons on a compromise qualification, which wholly avoids the time-honored oath. The anti-Bradlaugh campaign was vigorous and its arguments decidedly taking, while the Liberals did not undertake to wage their side of the contest with anything like seriousness or purpose. The result has been a defeat of the ministerial party in spite of its considerable majority on all partisan issues. The Gladstone ministry will not reign, although the tories are in high glee over their victory.

The Civil Service Commission.

Randolph B. Keim having declined to send a letter of withdrawal to the civil service commission, did transmit one to the president Thursday after an extended interview. He is reported to have handed it to him with the remark: "I have brought you the death warrant of the civil service commission." Mr. Keim says he relinquishes the place with less regret because the power of the commission has been contracted to simple examination by pedagogues through the emasculation of the rules by the cabinet. Mr. Lyman, who has the place and was commissioned is a prominent civil service advocate. It is expected that his appointment will give satisfaction.

Immigration.

During April there arrived in the several customs districts 87,245 passengers, of whom 78,475 were immigrants, 4,982 citizens of the United States returned from abroad, and 3,788 aliens, not intending to remain in the United States. The number of immigrants who arrived in the Minnesota district that month was 74; during April, 1882, 166; during the ten months ended April 30, 1883, 1,022; same period last year, 900. The total arrivals of immigrants in the same districts during the corresponding month last year numbered 104,274—a decrease of 25,799 arrivals; in these districts for ten months ending April 30, 417,689; same period last year, 544,601—a decrease of 126,912.

Damages for a Damaged Heart

Referee John Croak, in the suit of Bernard Barwick for $10,000 damages for breach of promise of marriage, was decided immediately in favor of Miss McLean, the defendant in the case. Counsel said that the decision had been received too late to take action upon it immediately, but he should at once apply to the referee for a certificate to the effect that he should have an extra allowance of 5 per cent. on the $1,000 damages. This, he thought, would probably bring the total cost that Barwick would have to pay up to $100. In case the plaintiff would not be able to pay the $1,000, execution would issue against his body, and he would be sent to jail. "Thus, you see, there is some difficulty in getting damages for a broken heart."

Dynamite Mezzeroff.

Prof. Mezzeroff, the alleged instructor of the dynamite school, in New York said, addressing a meeting:

In all there are over 10,000,000 soldiers who are supported by laboring men of the old world, yet when I propose to use a bomb costing $2,000 in place of a Krupp gun costing $1,000,000, I am called a fiend. If we want to kill each other let us do it on principle. Gunpowder flies at the rate of 1,200 feet a minute; dynamite at 200,000. If you use my explosive you can defend yourself against all the armies of the world. I have the same right to educate men in chemistry that Chandler has, and I won't stop until every workingman in Europe and America knows how to use explosives against autocratic governments and grasping monopolists.

End of the Drive Well Cases.

The decision of the United States district court at Des Moines Wednesday, denying the validity of the Green drive-well patent, recalls a group of very notable cases, and ends a tedious and hotly contested litigation in Minnesota and Iowa. The Iowa case is a test for nearly 200 cases in Minnesota, and probably a larger number in Iowa, which were brought in local courts two or three years ago by the proprietors of the Green patent, to enforce their claims for royalty upon the users of drive-wells. The Iowa decision is said to carry with it all these cases, and to free all users of drive-wells from claims for royalty under the Green patent, unless reversed by the supreme court, to which it will doubtless be carried.

The Coming Railroad War.

Another meeting has been held to settle the differences relating to freight rates to upper Mississippi river points. The idea of establishing three kinds of rates has been abandoned: It was agreed that the roads in the Northwestern Traffic association should quote on this business the regular tariff rates and make no rates in connection with the water lines. Another meeting will be held Monday to take further action. It is generally believed that a war on Upper Mississippi river business cannot be avoided. It is stated that contracts have been made in connection with the water line on St. Paul business that cannot be abrogated and which will force the rail lines to reduce their rates also. In order not to break up the traffic association it is probable that the roads next Thursday will agree upon special rates to St. Paul and other points affected by the water competition, to prevail during the summer.

Suicide of a Cleveland Millionaire.

The people of Cleveland, Ohio, were startled Friday evening by the announcement that Amasa Stone, the well-known railroad man, capitalist and philanthropist, had shot and killed himself. Since last November, Mr. Stone has been afflicted by insomnia, brought about by indigestion, and of late his condition has been so much worse that he was unable to obtain more than an hour or two of sleep in a night. He did not leave his bed Friday morning, and at noon complained that he was feeling more depressed than usual. At 2 o'clock he was consulted by his secretary on a matter of business, conversing at that time in a perfectly rational manner. About 2:30 o'clock Mrs. Stone, who had been in her husband's room all day, went away for a short time, as he had expressed a desire to sleep. About 4 o'clock she had again visited the room and discovered that Mr. Stone had arisen from his bed. She went to the bath-room, but found the door locked. A servant climbed up through the transom and discovered Mr. Stone already dead, and partly dressed. It is supposed that after bathing he was seized with a sudden impulse and fired a bullet through his heart with accurate aim. Death must have been instantaneous. He leaves a widow and two daughters, one the wife of Col. John Hay, recently assistant secretary of state, and the other the wife of Samuel Lather. Col. and Mrs. Hay sailed Thursday from Liverpool after a protracted absence abroad.

Cook's Large Contract.

The battle in Sonora, in which the Mexican forces were victorious, has fully established the fact that the number of renegade Apaches is more than three times greater than theretofore believed. Gen. Garcia places the number of Indians encountered on the west side of the Sierra Madre mountains at from 150 to 200 warriors. From the best information at hand the number of hostiles in the mountains and eastern slope will not fall short of 100 or a total of not less than 300 warriors. The present campaign has brought out this information. It is anything but encouraging to the people of Arizona. The Sierra Madres are the most abrupt, precipitous, extensive and lofty chain of mountains in Northern Mexico. It is almost impossible to penetrate this vast mountain range, and when the area, which is as large as the state of Ohio, is taken into consideration, every one who has the least knowledge of such a country and the fighting propensities of the Apaches, will readily realize the magnitude of the undertaking. The Modoc war was but a small affair in comparison to what awaits Gen. Crook and the Mexican forces in dislodging and subduing the Apaches in he Sierra Madre. As the Apache question now presents itself it will require at least a six month's campaign with the best backing the government can give to Gen. Crook, and with the hearty co-operation of the Mexican forces to bring the renegades to terms. The task is herculean, and, without doubt the most difficult that Crook has ever undertaken. If he fails the Indian troubles in Arizona will have but just begun.

The Great Earthquake in Persia.

Tabriz, the city lately destroyed by an earthquake, with the loss of several hundred lives, is the capital of the Persian province of Azerbijan, and is a walled city near the river Aji, with a population of 120,000. It is situated on a wide plain, 4,644 feet above the sea. The streets are narrow and tortuous, the houses low and flat. The most remarkable structures are the citadel, a lofty building of brick, the blue mosque, built in the seventeenth century by Abbos the Great, and the villa of the heir apparent to the Persian throne, who resides there as governor of the province. It is one of the most important commercial cities of Persia, and is on the caravan route between the interior and Trebizond and Tiflis. It has been frequently captured by the Turks, and several times nearly destroyed by earthquakes. At present it contains less than 100 European inhabitants.

Our Treaty With England.

Charles Reed has been studying extradition treatise, and finds that our treaty with England only stipulates that a certified copy of an indictment and a certificate of the jurisdiction of the court the grand jury of which presented the indictment, is required to procure an extradition. The treaty does not say that in this country the secretary of state shall be the ultimate authority in granting the decision, but it says that he may be. When the treaty was being negotiated, the question of political offenses came up, and England refused to allow them to be specified as exempt from the operations of the treaty, because she would not consent that American officials should determine whether an offense was committed in England or not. Of all our extradition treaties, that with Belgium is the only one that stipulates that the evidence against the accused shall be submitted, and the accused shall not be tried for any offence other than that for which he was extradted. In this connection, however, it is worthy of notice that in two or three recent cases England has insisted that an extradted person should not be tried for any offence other than that for which he was extradted. In regard to political offenders, England has always taken broad ground in favor of the right of asylum, and in the case of the Cubans, lately surrendered to Spain, by an unauthorized official at Gibraltar, England even undertook to decide the real accusation against them was political, though the recorded charges were murder or some other common crime, for which was extradition provided.

A Cree War Threatened.

Col. Ilges has received information that the Cree Indians are preparing for a general war. Three hundred lodges, under Big Bear, Lucky Man and Little Pine, are camped within twenty-five miles of Fort Walsh, preparatory to crossing into Montana to avenge the loss of Crees in the late horse stealing raids. Col. Ilges' informants are scouts who have been in the camp. Ilges immediately on learning of the proposed raid dispatched couriers to Fort Walsh to demand of the British authorities to take immediate action to prevent the Indians from crossing the line, if possible. He thinks the first attack will be made on the Gros entre and Assinniboine Indians, and that it will cause a general war. In which case the stock interests of Northern Montana are sure to suffer, and no white man's life will be safe on the prairies. A party of Cree raiders a few days ago stole forty horses from the Benton & St. Louis Cattle company, and are being pursued by two companies of Fort Assinniboine cavalry, under Capt. McAdams, making day and night marches. A fight will probably result.

Down on Commissioner Loring.

Washington Special:—President Williams, of the National New York Cane Grower's association, has written a letter protesting against Dr. Collier's removal, and requesting his reinstatement and the removal of Commissioner Loring. The present importance and the prospective magnitude and value of the sorghum industry are set forth. President Williams then goes on to complain of Commissioner Loring's inefficiency and to declare that he has done nothing worthy of approbation since he became the head of the department. He has attempted to crush the sorghum industry, etc. The president is therefore asked to remove him. Commissioner Loring does not appear in the least disturbed by the accusations against him or the strong opposition shown to his administration of the department.

Raided by King Cotton.

It is said that an enterprise is now on foot that in breadth and bigness is the largest thing in this decade. It is a plan to get out of the grip of the United states $13,000,000, with accumulated interest for nearly twenty years. The money was received for cotton taken from private individuals and sold by government agents. It was the intention of Secretary Chase to hold this money in trust for the persons to whom the cotton belonged, but for some years nobody has been able to obtain a dollar. The new combination has brains, courage and money behind it, so it may win. It will play for a big stake.

Sage Sentenced.

Lewis M. Sage, the slayer of Shipley, at Faribault, Minn., was sentenced on the 14th inst. In reply to the usual questions he expressed himself perfectly satisfied with the manner in which the case had been conducted, and after thanking Judge Buckham for the impartiality he had shown throughout, received his sentence, to be confined in the state prison at Stillwater for four years at hard labor. The universal sentiment expressed upon the streets was anything but flattering to the jury, and the general opinion is that the verdict should have been murder in the second degree, as charged in the indictment, or at least manslaughter in the second degree.

The Logging Season.

The Superior Lumber company have started their mill, the largest in the country, for the season. The company has 27,000,000 feet of lumber to cut. At Ontonagon, a fine rain has given a fresh impetus to the lumber drives on the river, and will add millions of feet to the receipts of the season. About 60,000,000 feet are now rafted at the Beef Slough boom, and they are turning out not less than 4,000,000 feet per day, and the consignments are about the same. As high as 5,000,000 feet per day will be rafted, providing the owners of logs will take them away as fast as rafted. One-half of the logs now rafted are new logs, banked during the winter of 1882-83. There are about 460 men at work now on the slough, say from Round Hill to the mouth of the slough. There was not less than 900,000,000 feet banked on the Chippewa river and tributaries last winter, probably 500,000,000 of which will be manufactured on the Mississippi river, and the rest on the Chippewa and tributaries.

An Army Paymaster Defaults.

San Antonio (Tex.,) telegram: Quite a sensation was created recently, by the confession of Maj. Wasson, paymaster, alleged to have been robbed of $24,000, on a train near Fort Worth, that the whole transaction is a fraud to cover his short accounts with the government. Wasson is now here at headquarters under arrest, having failed to obtain a clue of the robbers. Wasson was ordered to turn over the balance of the funds in his hands to Chief Paymaster Terrell and settle accounts. An examination by Col. Terrell exhibited shortages of about $5,500. Wasson confessed this deficit, but claimed to have made up the amount and been robbed of $24,000. Further questioned, he made a clean breast of the whole affair, that he had put up the job to cover his evil doings. He was immediately placed under arrest at headquarters, with scanty supplies of necessaries and heavily guarded by soldiers. It is said that his Iowa bondsmen are good for the indebtedness to the government, $5,500. He has designated the hiding place of the remaining $10,500 and officers went for it.

Senator Fair in Self-Defense.

Senator Fair in conversation with a press representative regretted bitterly and keenly the notoriety given matters so exclusively concerning himself and wife. He said: "I am the man, and I am willing to bear all the odium which the public, in ignorance of the real facts, may choose to cast upon me; but my regret is for my wife, whose name should be associated and incorporated in dispatches transmitted all over the country. Now, as always, my desire has been to do that which would contribute to the happiness of my wife and children. If my wife thinks separation will contribute to her further happiness, then her mind and mine are alike. I have done nothing to merit the obloquy cast upon me. God has blessed me with wealth. I have never used it for any mean or unmanly purpose. My heart and hand have always been open to those in distress, and will continue to be to those who seek or require my help. I will shield my wife's name by every means in my power.

A Sensation Promised in Masonic Circles.

A special telegram from Milwaukee says: An unusual stir has been observable for several days among the inner circles of the Masonic fraternity here. On inquiry the correspondent was informed that the stir result, from a promise of important and somewhat sensational disclosures in connection with the affairs in the office of grand secretary of the Masonic Grand lodge at the annual meeting in June. As the incumbent of the office is also grand secretary of all other grand bodies, the investigation may prove equally important to them also, in fact common report says that enough is known now to insure a lively sensation among members of all the grand bodies, and bespeak warm discussion when their annual meetings occur.

Union Pacific Railway.

The game of bluff which Sidney Dillon is playing suggests an outcome of the relations between the Union Pacific and the government, which is not altogether improbable. From 1894 to 1898, the whole burden of indebtedness resting on the Union and Central Pacific companies falls due. The bonds issued by the government to help build the Union Pacific reach $35,139,512, now amounting with unpaid interest, to $54,778,754. The Central Pacific debt on the same account aggregates $43,486,190. It will be impossible for either road to pay this enormous debt. If they fail, the government has the right to foreclose. The companies will probably ask congress to pass an act by which the government will take up these bonds, and issue others in their stead, to provide for which the present contributions of one-fourth of the net earnings will be continued. If this is not done, the roads will be given up. The owners of the Union Pacific already control a parallel line to Ogden by the Atchison and Rio Grande roads, and a connection to the Pacific can be easily made. The government surely does not want the road on its hands, and some arrangement is likely to be made before the bonds are due.

Debauched by a Doctor.

Particulars of a rape case at Inkster, a post-office about forty miles northeast of Grand Forks, Dak., has been received. A man named Noxon, a practicing physician of that place, is the rapist, and a daughter of a man named Malcolm, fourteen years old, the victim. The daughter was taking music lessons of Noxon's wife, and went to the house to receive her lesson. Noxon's wife being absent the doctor seized the opportunity, overpowered the girl and committed the rape. The girl told her mother and upon advice of counsel, Malcom sent Dr. Wheeler out to examine the girl, and he gives it his opinion that the girl's story is true. It is feared that Noxon will get out of town before he can be arrested.

A Female Incendiary.

A jury at Cloquet Minn., on the 12th inst., to investigate the burning of the Knife Falls Lumber company's store at that place several weeks ago have found a verdict charging M. E. Whitmore and Mrs. Kate McDonald with setting the fire. The woman is now in Carlton county jail serving a sentence for assaulting a lady. Two criminal warrants are now in the hands of the sheriff for her arrest, one for blackmail with a view to extorting money from H. Bradenburg of the lumber company, and another for burning the store. The prospects are that she will go to Stillwater. She is one of the worst characters ever in the vicinity. Whetmore, who has been her right bower, collected considerable money from his friends to use for bailing Mrs. McDonald, but skipped out with it.

Banker Mead's Alleged Murder.

Judge Stewart, of Portage City, Wis., will hold court for Judge Park at Waupaca, commencing May 22. The Vandecar-Mead murder case will then be tried, and the excitement preceding the event is becoming apparent. A strong effort on the part of the Mooney & Baland detective agency who arrested Vandecar, aided by others interested, will be made to convict the alleged murderer. Many who think Vandercar innocent say they will see fair play. The case will be one of the most important ever tried in the state. Mead, it will be remembered, was an eccentric and rich old banker living in Waupaca. His bank was robbed and he was murdered on the night of Oct. 7, last. Vandecar was arrested early in January as the perpetrator of the crime, and has been in jail at Waupaca ever since his arrest. There is a division of sentiment as to his guilt.

KANSAS CITY CYCLONE.

A Path of Destruction Two Miles Long Swept Through the Heart of the City but Only Three Lives Lost

A destructive cyclone swept across the southern part of Kansas City on the 13th inst., unroofing or demolishing buildings for a distance of two miles, the track of the storm ranging from half a block to two blocks in width. A number of persons were injured, and some fatalities are reported, but the loss of life will probably not be so great as might be expected in view of the extent of the destruction. At the stock yards the exchange was unroofed and other buildings damaged or destroyed. Then passing on it struck the summit of the bluff which marks the western line of the city proper, at the corner of Dripps and Sixteenth streets. Moving southerly it passed along between Fifteenth and Sixteenth streets, veering slightly at times until it reached Main street. Then the course changed somewhat toward the northeast, swerving gradually until it reached Olive street, near the eastern limits, when it had traveled as far northward as Seventh street. Here its advance was checked, and as far as known now its force seems to have been spent at this point. The storm from the beginning of the first to the end of the third cloud, occupied about half an hour. Three deaths had been reported and as many more not likely to recover. Many persons were more or less injured, but, as reported, only a few dangerously so. The loss of property is now roughly estimated at $200,000. While some of the finest residences of the city suffered, yet many of well-to-do citizens are razed, and cottages and shanties innumerable shaken to pieces. The escape of those in the path of destruction was marvelous, and stories of almost miraculous delivery are beyond number.

WASHINGTON, Special Telegram, May 13.—The Army and Navy Register this week publishes a list of officers to be retired, to include Dec. 31, 1892, with the date at which each officer will retire. In the list are the following, including officers now stationed in the Northwest:

Mason, Ninth infantry, Aug. 21, 1888; Maj. Edward Ball, Seventh cavalry, Feb. 23, 1898; Lieut.-Col. George Gibson, Third infantry, April 4, 1888; Capt. E. Butler, Fifth infantry, March 19, 1891; Col. John Gibbon, Seventh infantry, April 20, 1891; Col. Richard Q. Dodge, May 19, 1891; Lieut.-Col. Orlando H. Moore, Seventeenth infantry, July 13, 1891; Col. George L. Andrews, Twenty-fifth infantry, April 22, 1892.

It is an interesting fact that neither Sheridan nor Schofield will retire during the next ten years. Sheridan, who will be fully in command of the army next February, will remain in that post for more than ten years, and it is a flood for speculation who, after him, will be at the head of our military forces. It may be Miles, or it may be Mackenzie, but as the promotions to the grades of brigadier general and major general are made by selection, it is very unsafe to make a prediction.

Rich Women of the Country.

Speaking of rich widows in this country, the Brooklyn Eagle says: "There is Mrs. Stewart, worth anywhere from $30,000,000 to $50,000,000; Mrs. Stevens, worth $4,000,000; the widow of the late Commodore Vanderbilt, Mrs. Hicks-Lord and half a dozen others. In Philadelphia are the widow of Thomas A. Scott, who is worth at least $10,000,000; Mrs. Bloomfield H. More, worth fully as much; the widows of the two projectors of the Baldwin Locomotive Works, who are estimated to be worth about $3,000,000 apiece; Mrs. Borie, worth about the same amount; the widow of the late George Fales, whose superb art collection was sold at auction, and the widow of Henry Ralle are worth more than $3,000,000 apeice. Any of these ladies is wealthy enough to buy the most prominent of foreign potentates."

Boston's richest women and the amount of their possessions are noted as follows in the assessors list: Mrs. Susan O. Brooks, $1,034,300; Mrs. J. L. Gardner, $1,203,800; Mrs. James M. Beebe, $800,700; Mary and Anna Wigglesworth, $807,500; Isabella P. Hunnewell, $702,400; Susan S. Williams, $554,200; Alida L. Borland, $399,600; Ellen S. Eldredge, $377,800; Caroline A. Brewer and tr., $376,100; Lucinda C. Collamore, $375,100; Anna C. Lodge, $360,000; Adaline D. Hooper et al., $319,200; Charlotte A. Johnson, $316,500; Cora L. Shaw, $310,400; Elizabeth T. Eldredge, $274,100; Susan T. Kimball, $262,600; Ellen Brooks, $352,000; Mary B. Sigourney, $234,000; Mary T. Goddard, $231,200; Mary E. Leeds et al., $201,500. Mary A. Ballou, $200,700; Ann M. Revelations of the Census.

The revelations of the census of 1880 are a continuing wonder. Nothing will impress one who carefully studies the census more than the extraordinary grown of the Western States. Minnesota Homestead Entries.

WASHINGTON, Special Telegram, May 14.—The commissioner of the general land office to-day, sent a letter to the register and receiver at Benson, Minn., regarding John Hendricks' homestead entry. The officers at this place, it appears had construed the decision in the case of Robert Whitall vs. the Hastings & Dakota Railroad company as holding that where the settlers entry was canceled under the rule established by the Kinskern decision, the settler may if he still occupied the land make a new or second entry of the same. The commissioner says the decision in the Whitall case was not general in its application. The commissioner has also forwarded to the same officers a letter regarding the homestead entry of Ole Balstae. The letter was in response to one received by the department from John K. Nelson, asking why patent does not issue in this homestead entry. The commissioner says that:

He finds that the tracts in odd numbered sections are within the twenty mile limits of the grant to the St. Paul and the Pacific main line. Balstae's entry was canceled for conflict with the grant. In 1877 an application was made for a reinstatement in his entry accompanied by a relinquishment made by the railroad company of the said tracts. The general land office made the reinstatement asked for, basing its action on the relinquishment, thus in effect accepting the relinquishment with the condition attached thereto allowing the company to select lands in lieu of this relinquishment. It does not appear from the records that the company has ever done so. The State by act of its legislature March 1, 1877, waived its right to select or receive any lands upon the grant named upon which had been filed any valid homestead filing on entry. The act directed the governor of the State to deed and relinquish to the United States all the lands so entered and occupied by actual settlers, and to accept as a guide in such matters proof by the settler before the local United States land officers. Mr. Balstae's proof being satisfactory to the officer, he should apply to the governor for relinquishment of the lots named. The relinquishment by the company on April 12, 1877 is of no effect, as the company has no title to the lands. The action of the office accepting the relinquishment is therefore reversed and the relinquishment rejected, subject to appeal by the St. Paul, Minneapolis & Manitoba railroad company, successors to the first named company.

The local officers are directed to notify Balstae; the resident attorney will be notified by the general land office.

Republican State Convention.

A meeting of the members of the Republican state central committee was held in St. Paul on the 9th at the office of Hon. C. K. Davis, chairman of the committee. All the members were present, either in person or by proxy. The object of the meeting was to select a time and place for holding the state convention, and also to agree upon the basis of representation. After an informal discussion it was decided that the convention be held at St. Paul on Wednesday, June 27, and that the call be based on the average republican vote for executive state officers in November 1881, one delegate for each county and one delegate for each 400 republican votes or major fraction thereof. The resignation of Judge Collins of St. Cloud as a member of the committee was accepted, and Albert Scheffer of St. Paul appointed to fill the vacancy.

It reminds one that Minnesota and her educational system is taking on age when the Winona Normal school invites attendance on its twenty-fifth annual commencement, the 30th of this month. The exercises extend over three days, from Sunday, the 27th, when Dr. Smith of St. Paul delivers the baccalaureate, to the regular graduation on the following Wednesday. An alumni reunion and banquet is to be held the evening of the 30th, and a strong effort is being made to bring together a large number of the alumni of the school and insure the usual enjoyable occasion.

Several suspicious characters supposed to be a portion of the gang who recently burglarized Silver Falls, have been plying their vocation in the vicinity of Rush City. A house was burned at Pine City last night and three places robbed of small amounts. Rush City people were ready for them with a brigade. The whole town was out Friday night. Two have been taken and others probably will be before morning.

Judge Ueland, of the Hennepin county probate court, rendered his decision Friday in the Washburn will case. He holds that the will is invalid, so far as it ignores the dower rights of the widow under the law of the state, and that she is entitled to one-third of the property before the other provisions of the instrument are carried out. This is understood to be an amicable suit submitted to the court, upon an agreed statement of facts, to bring the case before a higher tribunal for adjudication.

At the examination of applicants for admission to the military academy at West Point, recently, Delbert Coggswell of Shakopee was the successful applicant.

At Benson, a man named Fountain wa arraigned recently before Justice Gunderson charged with committing assault upon O. Wenaus with intent to kill, County Attorney Hudson appearing for the state and Edward Thomas making the complaint. Fountain waived an examination, and was committed to jail and his bail fixed at $2,000, which, though low, will probably be sufficient, as he seems likely to fail in getting bondsmen, no one being willing to incur the odium and risk attending such a move in his behalf. Wenaus is resting easier and hopes of recovery are growing stronger.

JOE BRADY'S EXECUTION.

The Convicted Murderer of Cavendish and Burke Successfully Hanged in Dublin.

Dublin Telegram 14th.—Joe Brady was hanged at 8 this morning. A vast concourse gathered outside the prison yard in which Brady was executed this morning. A strong force of cavalry infantry and police were present to preserve order. There was no attempt at disturbance, however. The morning opened beautifully, but there were showers at about the time the execution took place. Brady rose at 6 o'clock. At 6:35 Cannon Kennedy, of St. James Church and Father O'Reilly administered the sacrament to the condemned man. The three remained praying until the arrival of the hangman. Brady submitted quietly while his arms were being pinioned, and walked slowly and unflinchingly to the scaffold. The black flag, indicating that the execution had taken place, was hoisted over the prison at 8:30. Almost immediately after the flag was raised a hearse and coach with mourners were seen at a distance coming in the direction of the prison. The police, however, interfered and prevented the vehicles from approaching. There had been reports circulating that after the hanging of Brady his friends would endeavor to excite the people to a demonstration by parading an empty hearse through the city. Brady was visited by his mother last evening. She was heard to exclaim, "Mind, Joe, no statement!" Brady smiled and replied: "Don't be foolish; do you think I am a fool?"

It is stated the mother threatened to disown her son if he gave the government any information. A wreath of flowers was received by Brady, to which was attached a card bearing an expression of grief at his fate, from Irishmen living at Liverpool. Brady made no statement to the jail chaplain or to the governor of the prison. One of the last things he did was to write a letter to his mother. He carried a prayer-book to the scaffold, and was thoroughly resigned and firm. His body fell nine feet and his death was instantaneous. Brady was dressed in the same clothes he wore during his trial. The number of persons in the crowd outside the jail, it was estimated, reached 10,000. The throng is said to have been even greater than any of those which collected when executions were public. At the moment a black flag was seen over the jail a cry was raised of "Hats off," and every head was uncovered. The crowd shortly afterward dispersed quietly. The verdict of the coroner's jury was that Brady's death was caused by a rupture of the spinal cord. A juryman stated that the features of the dead man were slightly swollen and his eyes protruded. His tongue was half cut between his teeth.

Old Denis' Pension.

The prudent care of money is not usually a characteristic of those who come suddenly by it. Caroline Gilman, in a remembered incident of a railroad ride from Washington to Baltimore, years ago, describes the simple and incautious delight of an old Revolutionary pensioner who, late in life, had just received his government money. Very fortunately for the confiding veteran, so ignorant of the perils of travel, he found friends instead of enemies.

As we entered the railroad-car, an old man took his seat in front of us, dressed in home-spun, with a miserable hat, sunburnt face, and two soiled bundles in his hand.

I shrank instinctively from the contact, and dreaded two hours' proximity to such a low-looking creature. . . . After a while he took out an old leather pocket-book, and among a few other loose papers unfolded one which the seal and signature of the secretary of war; and as my eye ran over the plain printing, I perceived that it was the pension certificate of Edward Dennis of Maryland, a revolutionary soldier. What change came over him in my eyes that moment! It was the difference, to me, of Moses going up the mount and Moses coming down. There was a glory round him.

The old man turned the paper over and over, and read it and re-read it. He wanted sympathy.

"This is worth a long journey," said he at length, showing it to a passenger near him; "four hundred dollars down, and eighty dollars a year for a man seventy-eight years old." And he took out the bills from the pocket-book, and a large handful of Gen. Jackson's shiners from his waistcoat.

"Why have you not applied for a pension before?" said the passenger to whom he had showed the bond.

"Because I didn't want it," said the old man, with a smile. "You wouldn't have had me ask for it before I wanted it; would ye?"

A New England gentleman, whose name, if I dared to give it, would lend new interest to this narration, was reading, in the seat with me. I whispered to him the character of our fellow traveler, and he laid down his book.

After a little the old man borrowed it and read without glasses, two or three pages with apparent interest.

"How much might you have given for this book?" said he to the owner.

"I shall think it a cheap purchase," was the reply, "if an old soldier of the Revolution will accept it;" and taking out a pencil, he wrote,—

"Presented to Edward Dennis, a soldier of the revolution, by one who is now reaping the fruits of his bravery."

The old man smiled as he received the book, turned it, looked at its cover, then within; and taking the pencil from the hand of the giver wrote in a fair hand the name he saw on the first leaf. But after all, he could not realize that it was a gift, and, as his pockets were overflowing, he took out a dollar.

"No, no, my good friend," said the giver, "put it up;" and in a lower tone he added, "don't you show your money to anybody again but your wife."

"No more I won't," said the old man, understandingly.

Irish Bull in Parliament.

Mr. Callan, M. P. whose habits are well-known to be convivial, not long ago gave utterance to an unlucky phrase. Speaking of an allegation of the Irish Attorney-General, he said he could "swallow a good deal," and he was going on to say he could not swallow that; but before he could get to the second half of the sentence the house burst into uproarious laughter. The strangers in the gallery did not know what it meant, and Mr. Callan himself did not know for a moment. "I can swallow a good deal," he repeated, and again there was an outburst of uproarious laughter in which the whole treasury bench joined. Mr. Bright was conversing with Mr. Peter Rylands below the gangway, and his conversation was interrupted by the mirth. He paused to inquire and then joined in the laughter, which by this time extended to Mr. Callan himself.

Sampson's Addition.

This valuable addition to the city of Crookston is rapidly being improved and will soon be one of the handsomest places in our city. Work is being pushed upon the new flouring mill, many dwelling houses have been built and many more are in process of erection and very soon many of the streets will have been graded and affairs got in ship shape. We are told that the foot-bridge will be completed across the dam in a few days and that the wagon bridge will follow suit shortly after. What with the amount of improvements already there and those contemplated this addition offers greater inducements for investment than any we know of. We are told that on and after May 21st prices will be raised to something near the real value of the lots and all who contemplate purchasing on Sampson's Addition should be about it.

The Duluth Evening Herald says some of the SMALL COUNTRY papers have been giving the Boston Ideal Uncle Tom's Cabin party a bad racket, or words to that effect. Well yes, the Herald is about right, though that is the only part of their criticism which hits the mark. The AGE was one of the small country papers which entered into a brief review of the aforementioned fraud. The company "saw" the AGE and paid their bill when presented for advertising to the entire satisfaction to the publisher. The Herald infers that the manager did not favor the "small country papers" with complimentary tickets, hence their attitude. The AGE infers that the VERY SMALL city paper alluded to was favored with complimentaries and was induced thereby to puff the most utterly snide company now on the road. Their rendition of Mrs. Stowe's world renown drama if witnessed by the author would have caused her instant death. None of the characters were well taken except that of their STAR, the little lop-eared jackass who to his everlasting credit, be it said refused to perform with the rest, given only a solitary street exhibition—[Aitkin Age.

Messrs. Palliser, Palliser & Co., of Bridgeport, Ct., the well known Architects and Publishers of standard works on architecture, have lately issued a sheet containing plans and specifications of a very tasteful modern eight-room cottage with tower, and also with the necessary modifications for building it without the tower, anb with but six rooms if desired. In its most costly form, the outlay is estimated at $3,000; without the tower it has been built for $2,500; and if only six rooms are included, the cost may be reduced to $1,700 or $2,000. Details are given of mantels, stairs, doors and casings, cornices etc. The publishers have found it the most popular plan they have ever issued, and state that it has been adopted in more than five hundred instances within their knowledge. The same firm issue Specifications in blank adapted for frame of brick buildings of any cost; also forms of building contract, and several books no modern inexpensive, artistic Cottage plans which are of great practical value and convenience to everyone interested.

County News.

St. Hilaire Happenings.

St. Hilaire Times.

Louis Foss a partner of Blyberg at Pelican Rapids, just arrived and will open up a large store of general merchandise. He has now two car loads of merchandise in Crookston, which he will bring to St. Hilaire. Mr. Foss is a gentleman of large experience in the mercantile business, and will undoubtedly meet with abundant success.

John Alderman, our mail carrier, says that in all things he endeavors to be loyal to Uncle Sam, but it is hard for him to see the necessity of so many extra steps, so he just picked up his goods and chattels this week, and moved into the house formerly occupied by Lorenzo Libby, where he will remain until he can erect a residence of his own, which he intends soon to do. This will make it much more convenient for him.

An article apeared in the last number of the Times stating that Campbell & Sorsoliet had sold their interest in the saw mill, which is a mistake. Campbell has sold out his half, but Mr. Sorsoliel remains a partner with Mr. Darling. This will make a good firm and we feel confident that lumber will be sawed at a lively rate when they fairly get started. Mr. Darling is a heavy man from Winona, and Mr. Sorsoliel is a wide awake business man, and owns a valuable farm with timber and prairie and a good water power adjoining Jones' addition. Success to the new firm.

Judge S. Fjoser, who has held the office of Judge of probate in this county for six years, has sold out his property in Crookston and has purchased a farm two miles from this place. The Judge has also purchased a lot in St. Hilaire and will immediately erect a building and open an office. He has been appointed a notary public by the Governor, and will soon be ready to make out deeds, mortgages and other legal instruments.

East Grand Forks Facts.

From the Courier.

J. D. Dreffor and John Eager returned to East Grand Forks from Dakota, Thursday, and say there is no such country as the Red River Valley.

The weather during the past week has been unsurpassed in point of loveliness. This is truly a highly favored region, neither too warm or too cold.

J. W. Howes received a telegram Thursday, announcing the sad news of his sister's death at Prescott, Wis. Mr. Howes left immediately for that place.

Mr. L. Seibel, of Richwood, Wis., who invested here quite largely last fall, and built the Seibel building, has returned to East Grand Forks and expresses himself as being well pleased with the town's prospects.

County News.

Red Lake Falls Doings.

From the Messenger.

Mr. Ernest Buse is preparing to plat another addition to our growing town. The more the merrier.

Duncan Terry, of the big livery stable in Crookston, is having a bonanza in the travel to and from Red Lake Falls. He is deservedly popular and would make a big hit if he were to establish a branch here.

St. Hilaire Happenings.

From the Spectator.

Miss Anna H. Steenerson of Fisher spent a few days of last week in town visiting friends.

F. C. Ashall, returned yesterday from a trip to Crookston, 167 acres of land richer than when he left on Saturday last.

The wife and family of Dr. Thomas of Crookston passed through town on Monday last on their way to Thief River where they go to rusticate for a few weeks on their farm.

Carman Carvings.

Courier.

Mr. Knudsen and family are down from Thief River country. Mr. K. reports the country all settled up and everything prospering.

W. D. Bailey put in his appearance again Tuesday morning last. He has been attending to the drive of logs near the Northern Pacific junction, and now we suppose he is ready to drive the farming interests.

Uncle Dan Cameron has returned from Scotland after a two months visit at his old home. He says the old home haint what it used to be, he found only one cousin living there of his own relations. He had a very rough voyage on the Atlantic returning and was glad to see land again.

Fertile Letter.

EDITOR JOURNAL: Seeding finished, and early sown grano is up and looking finely.

Mr. A. J. Gilmour has now a fine stock of drugs on hand. He is a druggist of some years experience, and is skillful in compounding prescriptions. He will have a full line of paints &c., on hand in a few days. Call and see him.

The school house is now finished, and we are waiting for the board to accept it, of which there is no doubt they will, as it is built in good shape, and is a credit to Messrs Barnes & Tollefson.

A Grand Ball will be given here next Monday night May 14th. Supper will be furnished at the Fertile House. We look for a fine time.

Messrs. LaDue & Co. finished seeding 185 acres of grain to day.

Mr. X. Sohler was up from Wild Rice this week, and put a new burr in the mill. They make a flour now that can not be discounted.

We notice that the school house in Dist. No. 65 is about finished, also one in the town of Godfrey. We are glad to see them going up as they denote a thrifty, and enterprising community.

Mr. A. J. Hamery informs us he has finished seeding on his R. R. land just west of town and that he intends to move there in a short time.

Mrs. Peter Aune, who has been a great sufferer for a long time, died last week and was buried Sunday, in the new burying ground just across the river.

Mr. J. W. Dillon has been very sick, but we are pleased to notice that under the care of Dr. A. Nelson he is inproving.

Mrs. P. H. Stromme died last Friday, and was buried Tuesday. She has borne her sufferings without complaint, and at last passed away peacefully.

We are glad to note that under the skillful treatment of Dr. L. S. Stowe Miss. Annie Holton is able to be around, The Doctor will be with, and one of us, all the time soon; meanwhile he is here every day but Sunday.

We are pleased to notice that the circulation of the JOURNAL is increasing here.

YOURS, J.

[Our esteemed Fertile correspondent writes at length in reply to "Viking," of Aldal, saying in substance that he did not mention Dr. Nelson's name in his former communication and that the doctor is a warm personal friend. So far as this controversy has gone it has not become very personal, but it has reached a point from which it might easily get decidedly personal; for this reason, the JOURNAL, seeking the highest good for both towns desires to be excused upon that topic. Our correspondents are both warm personal friends of ours and have both written excellent news letters and we regret to see even one little cloud arise which might break up very pleasant relations. We do not wish to be understood to mean that there should be no strife between two such enterprising towns as Fertile and Aldal are, far from that. There should be strife, a generous rivalry, each town should strive to get ahead in every thing good; should strive to do and be ahead of the meighbor in every good word and work and the representations of work through the prices should strive to see who can send in the most and the best news.

CROOKSTON, Minn., May 16th 1883.

HON. KNUTE NELSON, Alexandria, Minn.

SIR:—I have the honor to transmit herewith copies of four pre-emption filings, No. 526, Andrew O. Paulson, No. 528, Lars B. Larson, No. 532, Albert O. Lorum, and No. 537, Jacob Hasbey, made in this office on the 2d of August, 1872, which filings were canceled by Commissioner's letter "F" dated April 7th, 1873 for the reason that the lands were within the "forty mile limit" of the Northern Pacific Railroad land grant, (so far as relates to the odd numbered sections.) These cancellations were based upon a decision by the Interior Department, that the company's right to the grant took effect from the date of the acceptance of the map of general route by the Department (August 13th, 1870.) Under the Departmental decision dated May 18th, 1873, awarding the lands in the overlapping limits (within which the tracts now in question lie) to the St. Paul & Pacific Railroad, St. Vincent Extension, the right of the latter attached in the odd sections, Sept. 1st, 1871. In commissioners letter "F" dated Nov. 24th, 1880, it is held that the right of the St. P. & P. R. R., does not attach to their land grant before the 4th day of September 1872. In Commissioner's letter "F" dated July 8th, 1873, it is held that the right of the N. P. R. R., to its grant did not attach until the date of the actual definite location of the road and filing of the map in the General Land Office, November 21st, 1871.

I also invite your attention to a decision of the present Honorable Secretary of the Interior in the case of Graham vs Hastings & Dakota R. R. Co., reported in Copps' Land Owner for March 1883, page 236, and the present Hon. Commissioner's decision in the case of Johnson vs. St. Paul & Sioux City R. R. Co., Copps' Land Owner April 1883, page 20.

Your attention is also respectfully invited to the act of Congress approved April 21st, 1876, to confirm pre-emption and homestead entries within limits of railroad grants in a certain class of cases, U. S. Statutes at large Vol. 19, page 35.

The final proofs of the parties whose declaratory statements are herewith enclosed, were, after due publication of their intention to do so, offered at this office and rejected for conflict with the claims of the railroad companies, and forwarded to the General Land Office, May 19th and 20th, 1882.

In addition to the foregoing I enclose three pre-emption filings, Nos. 1208, 1216 and 1217, filed Oct. 8th and 20th 1874, in this office, which filings were allowed under the act of June 22d, 1874, U. S. Statutes at large Vol. 18, part 3, page 203, and Commissioner's letter "F" dated September 12th (two) and 23d 1874.

The rejected final proofs of Hans H. Bangen (D. S. No. 1216) and Peter Thompson (D. S. No. 1217) were forwarded to the General Land Office March 28th, 1882, and Thom. Anderson's final proof (D. S. No. 1208) was rejected and forwarded May 18th, 1882. These proofs were rejected for conflict with the claims of the St. P. & P. R. R. Co.

In the matter of these cases, I invite your attention to the decision of the Hon. Commissioner of the General Land Office, in letter "F" dated March 25th, 1875, where he ordered the patenting of Robert Houston's land, and the decision of the Hon. Secretary of the Interior, dated August 14th 1876, ordering patent to issue in the case of Nels R. Hage both under the act of June 22d 1874.

It is within my personal knowledge that all the aforenamed settlers have been constantly living on their respective lands since their first settlement thereon as shown by their declaratory statements, and that they have made valuable improvements on the same; therefore a final decision which shall deprive them of their homes upon these lands will work great loss and hardships for these men who have worked so long and so hard in good faith to secure the end which is supposed to be the primary object of our liberal land laws.

Understanding that you will soon be in Washington, these cases are forwarded to you in the confident hope that you will give them your attention and your powerful and effective influence will aid in securing the just rights of these settlers.

Respectfully,
P. C. SLETTEN.

To His Excellency, the President of the United States.

We, the undersigned, residents in Northern Minnesota, hereby petition your Excellency to revoke the executive order, dated March 18th, 1869, withdrawing the following towns in the Crookston, Minnesota, land district from settlement under the Pre-emption and Homestead laws, viz: T'p. 147, Ranges 37 to 42, inclusive; T'p. 148, Ranges 38 to 42, inclusive; and T'p. 149, Ranges 39 to 42, inclusive, for the following reasons:

1st. That said territory so withdrawn is composed exclusively of Agricultural Lands, and well adapted to farming.

2d. That said territory is not included in any Indian Reservation, and is not, in the estimation of your petitioners, required for Indian purposes, the limits of the White Earth Reservation being amply sufficient for the consolidation of the whole Chippewa nation.

3d. That at the time of the withdrawal said territory was being settled up by a thrifty class of actual settlers, and that since said time settlers have continued to settle upon said lands in large numbers and are now opening up farms and rapidly developing the resources of the country.

Your petitioners therefore pray that the order of withdrawal be revoked, believing that a restoration of these lands to the public domain will advance the best interests of the State.

Hon. Paul C. Sletten has had 100 of the above petitions printed which he has sent to every postmaster in this land district with instructions to obtain as many signatures as possible and return them to him as soon as possible. When the petitions are returned he will forward them to the Hon. Knute Nelson who will take them to Washington in person and lay them before the Secretary of the Interior, showing him the importance of the measure and urging him to recommend the revocation of the order of withdrawal by the President. We hope that every settler within the limits of this land district will at once recognize the vast importance of the measure and will sign the above petition which is one of incalculable benefit to this land district as it opens to settlement and cultivation thousands of acres of the most fertile lands in this new Northwest. And more than all this, there are many poor men who have located upon these lands already, staked their all and must lose unless these lands are eventually restored to the market, so that the measure becomes not only of vast benefit to the New Northwest but is also an act of justice to the poor settler. The JOURNAL has heretofore shown the importance of this measure and it is not necessary at this time to repeat what it has already said as its readers are doubtless prepared to sign the petition at sight. We speak for the new comers, those who have heard nothing about it heretofore.

Notice the new ad of Terry & Collins and go to the new stables on the corner of Main and Fourth Streets for a neat and nobby rig.

Martin Bang & Co., are doing well in their new hotel. They have a crowd of boarders and report business flourishing.

A long train of new Canadian Pacific box cars was in the yard on Tuesday. The train reached from the depot to the large N. W. elevator.

Work on the race track on the new fair grounds will commence at an early day. The track will be ready for use about the middle of June.

Ole Bang has his new hotel, the Scandinavian House, all ready to receive guests and already has 40 or 50 boarders. He is prepared to entertain 100 guests handsomely.

To-morrow evening Miss Phosa McAllister and her specially selected dramatic company at Erisson's hall. Reserved seats for sale at Tom Morris' jewelry store.

All school districts can obtain a copy of Webster's Unabridged Dictionery at one-half the regular list price. District Clerks should apply at once to School Supt. Carruth for blanks and instructions.

On Monday two Chippewa braves passed through our city, carrying the storied "birch bark canoe" upon their heads alternately. The canoe was about 20 feet long and a large one but it did not seem to trouble the Indians to tote it on their heads. One big brave would carry it awhile and then the other would lend a hand, (or head) to the work.

Dr. Thomas returned from his Thief River farm on Tuesday. He reports that he has 50 acres in wheat, 50 acres in oats and is now breaking 30 acres for oats. He says grass is up high enough to afford abundant pasturage for cows. The doctor will now remain awhile, during the breaking season to break such jaws as shall present themselves for that operation.

So much has been said about its being doubtful whether Remenyi would appear in this city that Max Ericsson has telegraphed the management who answered that Reminyi will positively appear on the evening of the 30th, which is one week from last night. Ericsson's hall will be packed full to hear this great violinist and it is thought that many will not be able to obtain even standing room. First come, first served.

The body of Edward Larson was found in the river by a Frenchman, on Monday night, near Joe. Simpson's farm, about four miles, by the river from the scene of the drowning. At the time of the accident Mr. Larson had a fine silver watch in his pocket but it was either lost in the river or taken off the body by some person, as it has not been found. The body was put in a neat coffin and buried on Tuesday afternoon,

Phosa McAllister played "State's Evidence" to a fair house on Thursday evening last. Miss McAllister is a pleasing actress in sentimental parts having few superiors. She has an excellent support throughout and when we say that "Ted" Irving is still with this company it is sufficient to say that the comedy is well up as "Ted" has few equals and no superiors in that line. This company will appear at Ericsson's hall to-morrow in an entirely new play to be followed by a farce.

About 1,000 acres of land was sold at the State land sale last Thursday.

Ed Bivins, of Stephen was skirmishing about the city early part of the week.

G. M. Barber & Co., have taken possession of their new drug store on Second Street. It is a gem in its line.

Nearly fifty pupils from the primary department have been sent into the city hall under charge of Miss Nellie Bancroft.

Stewart & Lawrence have put up an addition to their office building in which is stored building paper, paints and such things.

Track laying on the line betwen Shirley and St. Hilaire was commenced on Monday and goes along at the rate of a mile a day.

Ex-County Commissioner, C. O. Christianson, paid Crookston a visit on Saturday last. He says Crookston is a heap livlier than Fargo.

The little daughter of Superintendent Jinks fell in the race on Monday but was rescued with nothing more serious then a good wetting and a scare.

Wm. Erdman has torn down the malt kiln at the brewery and is rebuilding it, Though in use but four years it had nearly burned out entirely.

Mine host Huss, of the Norsk hotel, is having the front of that hostelry painted up in fine shape which will add much to the appearance of the place.

Mr. John Geddes, representing the Buddstikken, of Minneapolis was in the city yesterday. He will give his paper a good report of our thriving young city.

Mine host Fournet is putting in modern improvements as fast as they come. Workmen are tapping the water mains from which the Central House will take water.

Seeding is nearly completed and breaking commenced. On Monday Robert Houston started a breaking team on Section 4, Fairfax township. He expects to break up 100 acres.

Bond & Steenerson are rushers. While not doing much blowing about it they have been doing a rushing real estate business and have some of the finest property in the city in their hands for sale. When you want to buy or sell drop in and see the boys. They are always on deck.

Terry & Collins expect to take possession of their new stables on the corner of Main and Fourth Streets, this week. The main building is two stories high, affording, with the wing, accommodation for over 100 horses. The boys are doing a splendid business and well deserve their prosperity.

A meeting will be held in the main school building on Saturday evening next to consider the propriety of an issue of $15,000 in bonds for a large addition to the school building. The crowded state of our school rooms makes some step necessary, either the building of additional ward schools or an addition to the main school building. There should be a full attendance.

Andrew Steenerson has just had a life-like picture of himself and his canvassing rig taken and we must remark that it don't look ever-so-much like Andrew. It makes him look like he had the big head in a very eminent degree and every body knows that ain't Andrew. The animal who is propelling the vehicle looks like he had not got the big head to any very great extent the biggest part being ears—and that ain't Andrew by any means. The hat has the best looking countenance on it of the whole outfit but we can't describe the whole tout ensemble, (as it were) you will have to call in and see it for yourself.

The Bismarck Tribune says: Mr. John Leo, of Crookston, brother of Pat. Leo, of this city, is sojourning in Bismarck. He contemplates locating here.

Mr. John Leo has just returned from a visit to his brother Pat, at Bismarck, and says that while Bismarck is a good enough sort of a place to stay in awhile it won't do to tie to for a permanency. It don't begin to compare with Crookston for business present and future.

Phosa McAllister.

Miss Phosa McAllister the celebrated actress will appear in this city on tomorrow (Friday May 25th) at Ericsson's hall, supported by a company of specially selected artists in a grand double bill, presenting the beautiful drama of Marton, The Pride of the Market, and a laughable farce entitled Slasher and Crasher. The readers of the JOURNAL are already fully acquainted with Miss McAllister and her support as artists of superior ability, and it would be needless to say anything in their praise. The prices of admission are placed at 75 cents and 50 cents, no extra charge for reserved seats. Turn out and fill the house as it will be her last appearance in this city this season.

THE RECENT CYCLONE.

Great Damage at Racine, Wis., Loss of Life—Effects in Other Places.

Friday 18th. inst., was a cycloniah day and various parts of the northwest suffered severely, particularly Racine, Wis. The cyclone struck Racine at 7 o'clock passing through the extreme northwestern portion of the city, demolishing 150 houses and barns, and causing a loss of life of about twenty beside 100 more or less severely injured. The air was oppressively warm. The cyclone was announced by the breaking of the clouds, which took on a whirling motion and struck the earth with a noise which might be compared with the roar and rumbling of 1,000 railroad trains thundering over a bridge. The path of the storm was a little over a mile long and perhaps a quarter of a mile wide. In this territory here and there a building is left standing. Brick and frame houses alike were destroyed, and their sites are marked only by heaps of debris.

Many occupants of houses escaped by seeking cellars and other places of comparative safety, but the cyclone came with such lightning quickness that many were killed before reaching shelter. In only a few cases were houses moved from their foundations. Those in the center of the storm center simply exploded and fell in ruins where they stood. The cyclone, as it moved from the city out upon the waters of Lake Michigan, presented a grand spectacle, such as is seen but once in a lifetime. The revolving columns of air seemed monster wreaths of smoke, and they whirled over the watery expanse, bearing with them spiral columns of water. No ship that encountered this monster of the air could by any possibility escape destruction. The list of casualities, so far as they can be learned, is as follows:

Fatally injured—Mr. Kurtz. Herman Kurl, Mrs. McCarthy, August Kisner and wife, Simon Geise, son and daughter, and Fred Falk.

Killed—Paul Kuhl, Albert Kuhl, daughter of Barney Welling, infant son of August Kisner.

Watertown, Wis. was also visited by a terrific hurricane which has wrought devastation in that city. Houses were torn down and trees uprooted by this cyclone's awful strength every window in the south side of every house in town was broken. Hail stones as big as walnuts. In many panes of glass there were perfectly round holes as though made by a rifle ball. The roof of the Northwestern Lutheran university was blown off.

Shortly before six o'clock a dark cloud was seen hanging over Chemung, a small village near Harvard, Ill. Roaring was heard and suddenly a funnel-shaped cyclone formed and swooped down upon the place with fearful rapidity. Houses were torn to pieces like cardboard, and whirled thus in the air. Large buildings were leveled in an instant. There are no definite details, but it is understood that a number of persons were killed and at least twenty wounded. Passing to the east the storm struck Belvidere, doing considerable damage. Here the wind charged to the northeast and widened to a mile. Lawrence, a small station six miles north of Harvard, was badly damaged and the surrounding country desolate.

Duluth, Moorhead and other points in the northwest came in for a visitation. At Duluth a burst of wind blew down buildings, and among them one under construction was entirely destroyed at a loss of $6,000.

At Springfield, Ill., a large number of houses were demolished and many persons injured. The hurricane struck the earth again four miles east of the city, where the little settlement of Round Prairie is situated and played havoc with the lives and property of the farmers of that vicinity. The houses of William Nostrand, Mr. McVeigh, Henry Hughitt, Samuel Ashton, James Trotter, George Ray, Henry Turlly, Henry Farbec, and Samuel A. Grubb were torn down and great damage done their other property. The killed and injured are:

Mr. Booker and child. Mrs. English and two children, injured seriously. Mrs. Forbeg, killed. Mrs. Jane Van Nostrand, probably fatally injured. Misses Maggie and Annie Van Nostrand, badly hurt.

From Round Prairie the storm swept on to Dawson, nine miles northeast, but doing no serious damage until that point was reached. Here a number of houses were torn down and Mrs. Ferris killed. At Buffalo, a little hamlet, Mrs. Thomas Chandler was killed by the falling timbers of her house.

On Greasy Prairie, eleven miles south, the farm houses of Porter Story, Alex Gunn, William Blakeman, Thomas Nester, Jesse Covington, and A. Warsup were destroyed. One man, a boy, and two children were killed, and others injured. Near Franklin the storm was fearfully destructive. At Pisga, the house, barn and orchard of James Oxley were swept away and his wife and children seriously injured. At Woodlawn, where there was a fatal tornado three years ago, the railroad depot was destroyed.

At Leitenburg, some nine miles north of here on the Peoria branch of the Wabash railway, the storm was in the shape of a column and struck the south part of the town at the southern edge, going northeast, completely across the business residence portion of the place, leveling four stores, two churches, depot, repair shop, machine shop and thirteen dwellings, besides injuring others and destroying much other property. Five were killed and fifteen injured. The dead at Greasy Prairie now number four, a man named English, a twenty-year-old boy named Blakeman, and two children in the Westrout family, making ten dead.

At Clinton, DeWitt county the names of the dead are: George P. Clifton, Mrs. Clifton, his wife, and Ollie Clifton, aged seven.

At Grafton, Ill., Mrs. Garner was killed, and her husband is supposed to have been thrown into the ravine and killed and the body washed into the river. A daughter of Garner has a hip dislocated, and a daughter of Denny Shey a leg broken. The storm was also severe at Edwardsville. Mrs. Will Maxey of Alton was killed near Edwardsville by being blown against a tree. The roof of the court house was blown off.

BLACK HILLS DELUGE.

A Frightful Deluge Launched Upon Deadwood, Sweeping Seventy Buildings Away.

Deadwood, Dak., Special Telegram, May 29. On Wednesday the barometer took a sudden fall, and continued going down until evening, when a steady rain set in. Very soon the snow which had been laying in the mountains began to melt, forming rivulets which continued to grow every minute into torrents. At 4 p. m. the telephone message from the ten-mile ranch apprised Deadwood that the entire volume of snow from the mountains was moving, and to prepare for the worst. About this time White Wood creek, which runs through the city left its banks and began its first work of destruction, increasing every minute in volume, sweeping houses down the stream, cutting into the bank at places a depth of 100 yards. In a few hours over seventy houses had been washed away. But for the timely news it is impossible to say what the number of deaths would have been. Over one half of Deadwood is swept away, fortunately leaving the substantial portion of the city on Main street standing. The loss in this city is estimated at $600,000, but even now it is impossible to get a definite figure. Basket communication has been established between the separated portions of the city. The only deaths now known are George Chandler and wife and a hired man, and another man unknown. All the towns up the gulch are more or less damaged. All of Pennington is swept away. The greatest portion of Crook City and Spearish. The total losses from all these cities will be immense. Business is paralized throughout the gulch. The Homestake mine has nine feet of water over it, and it is safe to say that weeks of work will not repair the damage done to the mines and railroads. All the mines in the vicinity of Deadwood are shut down. The Golden Gate and South Bend are washed out. All the bridges through the country are washed away, and reports of disaster are being received from all quarters. Communication is almost impossible, as all the telegraphic lines are washed out and it is impossible to ascertain the amount of damage. Only one telephone line remains and that is overcrowded with work. The entire loss from this flood cannot fail to reach into the millions.

Rapid City, Dak., special, May 19.—The disastrous flood of Deadwood is upon us. This city is entirely surrounded by water, and many buildings will be swept away. The Rapid City valley, more than forty miles in length, all of which has already been seeded, is entirely submerged. The amount of damages done in this valley alone cannot be estimated. Many of the houses up the valley are being washed away, and probably many lives will be lost. An entire destruction of the coming crop may be expected.

CLIMBING LIFE'S LADDER.

Romantic History of Two Former Inmates of a Children's Home.

In 1867 there came into Cincinnati as stowaway on a freight train a lad of eleven years, who, tiring of country life, came here in the hope of bettering his fortune. Looking in the marvelous store windows did not appease his hunger, and he approached a friendly looking little bootblack, who, with kit slung to his back, was engaged in selling papers, and asked the contemporary, use of his box so as to earn money enough to buy something to eat. The bootblack, with great generosity, gave him five cents with which to buy something, and told him to wait around until the papers were sold, when, with the twenty cents that would be realized, they would get a square meal together. At the epicurean feast the Cincinnati Arab said: "The first thing yer want is headquarters—a place where you can close your blinkers at night without bein' pulled by their police. Yer want ter go to ther Children's Home on Third street, and give a name that ain't yer own, so if yer don't like it yer can skip and they won't find yer."

The advice was taken with the exception of giving the fictitious name. He told the truth straight through. For the succeeding nine years he lived off and on at the Home, making himself very useful to the institution, and at the same time learning the trade of stone-cutter. He was twenty years old when he bade good-bye to the officers of the Home and went across the river, where he obtained immediate employment on the southern railroad at his trade at the pay of $4 per diem. Three days afterward he was made foreman of the gang at the pay of $5 a day. At the end of the month a heavy contractor on the road made him superintendent at a salary of $200 a month and expenses. One month later found him the owner of some horses and carts, and doing sub contracting, which netted him in two years $23,000. He now, at the age of twenty-two years, felt that the field was not large enough for him, and he went west, where he took contracts on the Denver and the Rio Grande Railroads, and in connection with this work constructed for capitalists two hotels at Denver. Still restless, he pulled up stakes and went to Texas, where purchasing one-thousand Texan cattle, he went with the drove to Chicago and disposed of it, at a very handsome profit. He now found time to take a run to Georgetown, Ky., on the southern road, and there marry a buxom and loveable country girl whom he took with him to Colorado, where he bought a large cattle ranch, that is at present stocked with 1,600 head cattle and 140 ponies. Indians being too thick around his ranch, he has established his wife and two bouncing children at Colorado Springs. He is now but twenty-eight years old and is worth $80,000.

Day before yesterday he walked into the Children's Home and revealed his name to the officers, who it is needless to say, are delighted over the phenomenal success of their boy.

Nor is his the only case that reads like a romance. Eight years ago a beautiful little girl of four years was given to the institution by its depraved mother, who was one of the city's noted characters. The father, a worthless sot, disappeared. Within a few months the child was adopted by an excellent family, living in one of Cincinnati's beautiful suburbs. Her foster parents brought her up with every care, and now, at the age of twelve years, she promises to be an ornament to her home as well as to society. Within the past few days the father, who had not been heard of before in all these years, appeared at the Children's Home and demanded the custody of his child. His request was refused by the Trustees, who have no desire or intention to see her bright life wrecked. His demand to know where she was living met with no better result, and he now proposes to sue the Trustees who, it may be stated, will stand the suit, relying on the aid of justice in their cause.—Cincinnati Journal.

It is Just as Cheap.

It is just as cheap and a great deal cheaper to keep well than to remain in a state of ill health You don't see sensible, intelligent women stand back and hug their prejudices when a remedy for relieving female diseases is brought to their notice. No, sir! They try it first and pass their opinions afterwards. Every bottle of Dr. Guysott's Yellow Dock and Sarsaparilla sold to a woman will prove its merit as a reliever of those painful disorders incidental to female life. Try it.

Honored By a City.

The city of New York presented an extraordinary spectacle during the four days that elapsed between the death and the burial of Peter Cooper.

He held no office and bore no title. It was not usual even to prefix the "Mr." to his name when printed, but no citizen was so generally known and so deeply venerated. During the last two or three years of his life, although he retained his faculties almost unimpaired, his hair had assumed the color and texture of the finest white silk, so that he looked his ninety years without showing them in his walk or conversation.

Every one knew him,—men, boys, children, drivers and all the host of city wayfarers, thousands of whom had been benefited by the noble institution he had founded and personally watched and improved for thirty years. All made way for him. Every countenance gave him the salutation of a smile. The roughest drivers when they recognized him reined in their horses to let the old fashioned chaise pass more easily through the blockade of vehicles.

He retained to the last the most perfect simplicity of character. No one ever saw him unduly elated by applause, or in the least altered by success. His wealth could not inflate him, because he held it but in trust for the good of others. He was just the same plain, kind, friendly Peter Cooper as he was when he had his grocery store on the site of his institute, and invited his friends to a banquet of crackers and cheese on the top of a flour barrel.

And at length on that Tuesday morning, after the newspapers had gone to press, he breathed his last. The first news of the event was given to the inhabitants of the neighborhood by the flag in Gramercy park at half-mast. No one needed to be told the meaning of the symbol, for it was known that he was confined to his bed.

"He is gone," was passed from mouth to mouth, and as far as the tidings spread the flags drooped from every staff, until the whole city, the suburban towns, and all the cities in the state exhibited the same mark of respect.

If the head of the nation had passed away, the symbols of mourning could not have been more universally shown.—Youth's Companion.

ROSSA'S GREAT AGENT.

A Practical Chemist Talks About Dynamite and its Powerful Properties.

From the Philadelphia Times.

"You want to know something about dynamite?" said S. G. Rosengarten, who has been christened, like Baron Liebig, "one of the Fathers of Modern Chemistry," looking at the reporter curiously. "Well, dynamite is a pasty, dark mass, almost perfectly safe to handle with proper care, of which enough can be carried in a side pocket to destroy the lives of a hundred men if favorably situated, or to shatter a building as completely as half a barrel of gunpowder placed beneath it would. It does not explode on contact with fire, like gunpowder, but requires to be subjected to or brought in contact with another explosive agent, such as fulminate."

"How is dynamite made?" asked the reporter.

"By saturating pulverized or infusorial earth of great absorbent qualities with about three times its weight of nitroglycerine, the earth being added merely to make its transportation easy and comparatively safe."

"But these ingredients appear harmless enough," interjected the reporter.

"Oh, yes," rejoined Mr. Rosengarten; "harmless enough separately. We can eat glycerine on our puddings and fatten on it; we can use the earth to polish our tableware or clean our glasses. But when equal parts of strong nitric and sulphuric acids are gradually added, in small portions at a time and at a temperature below the freezing point, to a certain quantity of glycerine we have a bright yellow liquid which possesses extraordinary explosive energy and is called nitro-glycerine. It is this destructive compound which is used to saturate the absorbent earth I have mentioned."

"Where was it discovered and how?"

"Well, that is a disputed point. Some say that a young man in Wilmington, Del., discovered the explosive properties of dynamite accidentally, while working with glycerine and nitric acid, the resulting explosion seriously injuring his eyes. Others maintain that it was first discovered in Germany by a somewhat similar chance. I am inclined to wholly reject the accident theory, however. In 1864 Alfred Nobel, a Swede, of Hamburg, made its character known, his brother being killed in the experiments they conducted. Do not misunderstand what I said at fisrt about its being comparatively safe to handle, with proper—that is, the greatest—care, there is no very great danger of its exploding unexpectedly, but familiarity leads to carelessness, and its potential energy is too terrible for absolute safety under any circumstances. Excepting chloride of nitrogen and hypochloric acid in gas or liquid known to chemistry, yielding 10.684 measures of gas, while gunpowder yields but 800 measures. It is highly dangerous under almost any conceivable conditions, and I hope England will be successful in her efforts to suppress its manufacture. She is about the only power that can do it, as her territory is exceptionally compact and the laws enacted under recent panic give her officials extraordinary powers."

Other chemists in the city disagreed with Mr. Rosengarten's views as to the excessive danger of dynamite. One gentleman thought the English fright ridiculously puerile. He said he would not be afraid to carry half a pound of dynamite in his trousers pocket; "but," he added, "I should be very careful that no one knocked me down or gave me a kick on that pocket."

Counterfeiting.

Allen's Iron Tonic Bitters have proved to be the finest thing of the kind ever discovered, and consequently dishonest persons are counterfeiting them.

The genuine is put up in round black bottles holding 1½ pts., with a white lithographed label on one side, bearing the signature of J. P. Allen, and a yellow label on the other side. These are the old genuine and original Allen's Iron Tonic Bitters, and if they had not been good no one would have thought of counterfeiting them. This is no advertising dodge. Look out for frauds.

FIELD AND FARM.

The Flower Beds.

Now is the time to plant in the small garden plot geraniums of every variety, verbenas, sweet alyssums, rose geraniums, pelargonians or Lady Washingtons, and roses in every variety.

In gardens with southern exposure it is safe to plant all kinds of annuals—geraniums of every variety, roses of all kinds, without exception, begonias of the flowering order, verbenas, lantanas, Madagascar periwinkles, which blossom in two colors, white and purplish pink, and in general, all plants which can bear considerable heat.

As warmer days grow frequent seed-sowing will be attended with great results. The best annuals for selection are the portulacca, mignonette, the China aster, sweet alyssum, sweet pea, four o'clock, the double balsam (or as some people call it, lady slipper), candy tuft, double zenna (or youth and old age) and phlox of various kinds, notably phlox drummondi.

Very often plants purchased in pots are unsatisfactory and soon fade away; so, too, the gardeners finds himself face to face with similar experience in the garden plot. Often this arises from the prevalence of worms, and it is well to know that lime water will often exterminate such destructive parasites. Ordinary lime should be placed in a pail of water and allowed to settle, and if the water is freely passed over the mould tenanted by worms, it will destroy them effectually.

Creeping animals and climbing plants of every kind are always fascinating; whether for the open garden, for porches or for window gardening. The best for present planting are the morning-glory (which, although it will shut up, is always decorative by reason of its extensive foliage), the hyacinth bean, scarlet runners of various kinds, nasturtiums (not the dwarf), Maderia vines and hop vines, all of which, under favorable conditions, sufficient sunshine and careful watering, will appear above ground within two weeks and grow prolifically. They are all excellent for porches walls and balconies, if sufficiently sunny.

One Way to Make a Strawberry Bed.

For the private garden I have found the following plan about as desirable for garden culture of the strawberry as any I have ever tried:—

With a turning plow throw up a bed five feet wide (not wider), pulverize thoroughly and rake off smoothly. Lay off rows with the point of a hoe across the bed (not lengthwise), two feet apart and set the plants one foot apart in the row. When the plants throw out runners, train them across the bed so as to form a matted row of plants one foot wide, thus leaving one foot space between the rows for cultivation. After the first year the runners may be cut off. Common sense and good judgment must be consulted in training the runners so that the plants in the matted rows are not allowed to set too thickly. From three to five inches is thick enough. If the bed is not wider than five feet, it can be cultivated to the center from either side, and the berries can be picked to the center from either side without mutilating the plants.

Oak boards an inch thick and six inches wide (ordinary fencing plank) may be placed around the edges of the beds and secured in position by slabs or stakes. This prevents the soil from washing from the bed during heavy rains, and also assists in retaining the moisture. In late Fall or early Winter the bed should be mulched with wheat, oat or rye straw, pine leaves, decayed tan-bark or wood-pile chips. This mulch should be allowed to remain on the bed until the following Spring, when it may be removed or worked into the soil.—Rural New Yorker.

Cashmere That Costs a Good Deal and Velvet That Comes Still Higher.

From the New York Evening Post.

Beautifully fine, all-wool fabrics, in most delicate evening shades of lilac, almond, turquoise blue, crushed strawberry, pale willow green, sea-shell pink and primrose are shown, designed for the "smartest" of ball or reception toilets. French cashmeres in pattern boxes are exquisitely hand-painted or embroidered and require no other trimming. Unmade these pattern dresses cost $90 and an imported dress of the same material made up over surah costs $150. But a very much less expensive and equally artistic and beautiful toilet can be produced with the plain fabric in monochronie, simply adorned with ruffles and drapings of cream-white lace. Some of our own toilets, made of this material, have bodices of silk or brocade, of a tint matching the cashmere skirts, but this is a mistake and should be made as a French woman makes her dresses, with the bodice also of cashmere. French women are more likely to make their bodices of cashmere even when the shirts are of silk, as they know the material can be made to fit like a glove, and they use it whenever and wherever it is in keeping with other portions of the dress.

A costly novelty in lingerie is a graceful collar of black velvet or satin, cut in vandyke and richly embroidered on the deep points with tiny clusters of dark red roses and buds and black poppies with golden hearts. The edges are finished with slightly-gathered ruffles of black guipure lace, with a pleated frill about the neck of the lace. These collars are worn without a vestige of white around the throat. Other collars in the same style for evening wear are made of white satin or embroidered in white Marguerites outlined with tiny pearl beads and finished around the points with frills of pearl-beaded Venetian lace.

A Woman's Sunny Temper.

From a Floating Article.

What a blessing to a household is a merry, cheerful woman—one whose spirits are not affected by wet days or little disappointments, or whose milk of human kindness does not sour in the sunshine of prosperity. Such a woman in the darkest hour brightens the house like a piece of sunshiny weather. The magnetism of her smiles, the electrical brightness of her looks and movements, affect every one. Her children go to school with a sense of something great to be achieved; her husband goes into the world in a conqueror's spirit. No matter how people worry and annoy him all day; far off her presence shines and he whispers to himself, "At home I shall find rest." So day by day she literally renews his strength and energy; and if you know a man with a beaming face, a kind heart and a prosperous business, in nine times out of ten you will find he has a wife of this kind.

Imported Coiffures.

The latest spring and summer styles in hair dressing bear the names of royal ladies. The Queen Victoria, a coiffure of silver-gray hair with natural water-wave bandeau in front, is worn with court costume, diamond necklace, veil and feathers. The Queen Margaret of Italy is arranged with a Roman braid, high up on the head, and low down on the neck, with fluffy ringlets on the forehead, suitable for dark hair. The Empress of Russia style is a bewitching one, with double-wave bandeau and ringlets on the forehead, with the hair brushed back from the temples and double puffs at the back. The Queen of Sweden style is in steel-gray hair, a few ringlets on the forehead, a large, loose water-wave in front, and Grecian coil of medium height tapering off narrow to the neck. The Princess of Germany style has crimped front drawn backward, light, fluffy ringlets on the forehead, heavy braids back of the ear, and double braids low on the neck.

Two Ice Cream Recipes.

Strawberry Ice Cream.—Sprinkle sugar over the strawberries, mash them well, and rub them through a sieve. To a pint of the juice add half a pint of good cream; make it very sweet; freeze it in the usual way, and when beginning to set, stir in lightly one pint of whipped cream, and lastly a handful of whole strawberries sweetened. Put it into a mold and imbed in ice. Or, when fresh strawberries cannot be obtained, there is no more delicious cream than that made with the French bottled strawberries. Mix the juice in the bottle with the cream, and add the whipped cream and the whole strawberries, when the juice, etc., have partly set in the freezer.

Chocolate Fruit Ice Cream.—Make a chocolate cream; when set in the freezer add about half pound of assorted French candied or preserved fruits cut into small pieces. Put into a melon mold, to imitate a plum pudding. When ready to serve, turn the cream on a platter and make a circle round it of whipped cream, sweetened and flavored with vanilla. This cream is a decided success and a beautiful desert for a dinner party. It may be improved by sprinkling over it chopped almonds, dried, of a light brown color, mixed with chopped pistachios. This is intended to imitate the rugged appearance of the rind of a melon.

Hops and How to Grow Them.

The average price of hops is from 15 to 25 cents a pound. They have been as low as six cents, and as high as $1.05, but both these cases were exceptional. At 25 cents the crop is considered a profitable one. About the only consumers are beer brewers. The New England Farmer says a soil suited to Indian corn is adapted to hops. A deep, warm mellow loam is what the crop delights in, and if the field is partially protected from winds by hills or trees, all the better, as exposure to severe winds is fatal to success. The subsoil must not be over wet. A hard pan, holding water late in the spring is very detrimental. Hop roots live in the soil many years if the soil is suited to their growth, the tops only being killed in the fall. Prepare the land as for corn only make it deeper and richer. The hop has the male and female blossoms on separate vines, and like some of our strawberries, requires setting with an understanding of this fact. Eight male plants, distributed equally through the field, will be sufficient if they are trained on long poles. The plant may be grown from seeds, but the better way is to propagate by root cuttings from well-known desirable varieties. A bushel or two of roots, cut into lengths of five or eight inches with two or three good buds to each cutting, will be enough for setting an acre. The hills are usually made eight feet apart each way, care being taken to mark the rows out in exact squares to facilitate after cultivation. Four cuttings are enough to each hill, placing them in a square, in the middle of which the poles are afterwards to be set, though some planters set the poles the first year, and sometimes harvest a small crop the same season. The land should be as well cared for the first year as a corn field; indeed, it is allowable to plant corn in the intermediate spaces the first year, as it will not materially injure the growth of the vines. Vines that stray from the poles will need tying till they get a good hold. Coarse, unfermented manure is unfit for putting in the hills when the roots are planted, but such manure thrown upon the hills in the fall to lie through the winter, will both enrich the soil and protect the plants from too severe freezing. The manure must be raked off in the spring and the ground kept cultivated and free from weeds as during the first year, through the cultivator must not be run deeply enough to cut and injure the roots. The time to harvest will be indicated by the condition of the seed and the color of the burr. If picking is begun too early the vines will bleed like grape vines cut in spring, and more or less to their injury.

Parasites on Live Stock.

A writer says that to destroy lice on live stock he has found nothing better than strong carbolic soapsuds. The soap usually sold under the name is not strong enough for the purpose. It may be easily prepared and at any degree of strength that may be required. Get a pound of carbolic acid crystals, which may be had at any wholesale druggist's. I get them in Boston at a cost of 60 cents a pound. Take ten pounds of common bar soap, put it in a pan with a little water and heat until dissolved. Take out the cork from the bottle containing the acid, and set it in hot water, which will cause the acid to become fluid, add this to the soap and stir well. Set away to cool and you will have a soap at small cost which will be strong enough to kill any vermin which infest domestic animals, and which will cure barn itch and any cutaneous diseases to which they are liable. It is good to cleanse and heal sores, and a wash of it will be found good where the animals are hide-bound and the skin out of condition; it will be found good to wash the inside of poultry houses to render them sweet and kill and prevent vermin. It is a cheap, safe and sure remedy, and should find a place in all well regulated premises.

On the 12th inst., there was shipped from Mankato, via the Winona & St. Peter railroad, for the Dakota cattle company, forty cars young cattle, and from New Ulm, for the same company, sixteen cars more. The cars will average about forty-four head each, or a total of 2,464 head, These cattle were bought in Le Sueur, Nicollet, Watonwan, Brown, Blue Earth and Faribault counties, and is a pretty heavy draw upon the young stock. Further shipments are to be made the latter part of this week.

A NOTED BUT UNTITLED WOMAN.

[From the Boston Globe.]

Messrs. Editors:—

The above is a good likeness of Mrs. Lydia E. Pinkham, of Lynn, Mass., who above all other human beings may be truthfully called the "Dear Friend of Woman," as some of her correspondents love to call her. She is zealously devoted to her work, which is the outcome of a life-study, and is obliged to keep six lady assistants, to help her answer the large correspondence which daily pours in upon her, each bearing its special burden of suffering, or joy at release from it. Her Vegetable Compound is a medicine for good and not evil purposes. I have personally investigated it and am satisfied of the truth of this.

On account of its proven merits, it is recommended and prescribed by the best physicians in the country. One says: "It works like a charm and saves much pain. It will cure entirely the worst form of falling of the uterus, Leucorrhoea, irregular and painful Menstruation, all Ovarian Troubles, Inflammation and Ulceration, Floodings, all Displacements and the consequent spinal weakness, and is especially adapted to the Change of Life."

It permeates every portion of the system, and gives new life and vigor. It removes faintness, flatulency, destroys all craving for stimulants, and relieves weakness of the stomach. It cures Bloating, Headaches, Nervous Prostration, General Debility, Sleeplessness, Depression and Indigestion. That feeling of bearing down, causing pain, weight and backache, is always permanently cured by its use. It will at all times, and under all circumstances, act in harmony with the law that governs the female system.

It costs only $1. per bottle or six for $5., and is sold by druggists. Any advice required as to special cases, and the names of many who have been restored to perfect health by the use of the Vegetable Compound, can be obtained by addressing Mrs. P., with stamp for reply, at her home in Lynn, Mass.

"Mrs. Pinkham's Liver Pills," says one writer, "are the best in the world for the cure of Constipation, Biliousness and Torpidity of the liver. Her Blood Purifier works wonders in its special line and bids fair to equal the Compound in its popularity.

All must respect her as an Angel of Mercy whose sole ambition is to do good to others.

A Georgia Witness Who Gave Proof Positive That He Was a Son of Freedom.

From the Elbert South.

The present Judge Hutchins, of the Superior Court of the northeastern judicial circuit of this state, is the son of Nathaniel Hutchins, so well known by many of the older citizens of Elbert as one of the cleverest men and ablest jurists in Georgia. He was the predecessor of his son on the same bench now occupied by Colonel Hutchins, of Gwinnett, and was popularly known all through the upper portion of the state. During the progress of the superior court at Carnesville last week this amusing incident occurred, which was related to a New South scribe by Senator Phil. Davis: Colonel Thurmond, of Athens, an attorney, had an instrument of writing in court, the validity of which needed to be proven and which could only be done by the owner of the signature found thereon swearing to the same. The witness was called and an old gray-haired man, who had lived over his three score and ten, took the stand and Colonel Thurmond handed him the paper and asked:

"Is that your signature, sir?"

The old gentleman looked at the paper closely, and said:

"Wa'al I'll tell yer, Ize gitting old, and my eye-sight are not so good as it wunst was, but if somebody will loan me a par of specks, praps I kin cipher it out."

A pair of glasses were furnished him, and he scrutinizingly gazed at the document again.

"Well? said the lawyer.

The witness continued to peer at the paper.

"Very well," Colonel Thurmond said again, waiting for the witness to decide.

"Wa'al," said the old man, "that ar is my fist."

"You can come down, sir," said the lawyer.

But instead of "coming down," the old man turned his eyes on the Court, and after gazing at him for some time, he said:

"Jedge, is you old man Nath Hutchin's boy?"

"He was my father," answered the Court.

"Wa'al, give me yer hand, Jedge, kaze I loved yer daddy, and I is awful glad to see his boy followin' in his foot marks."

The court gave the old man his hand, and after shaking it heartily, the witness stepped from the stand and started out of the court room. When he had gotten out of the bar, and was about midway the hall, he turned abruptly about, and said in rather a loud tone of voice.

The court room was in an uproar of laughter, but the old man never smiled, as he returned the glasses and left the house.

THE LIME KILN CLUB.

Brother Gardner Reads a Deserved Lecture to Judge Perfection Smith.

From the Detroit Free Press.

"Am Judge Perfection Smith in de hall dis eavenin'?" asked the President as he laid aside his gravel and looked around him.

"Yes, sah," answered a voice full of fish-bones and shingle-nails shaken up together.

"Please ambulate dis way."

The Judge ambulated. He came up confident and smiling, expecting to receive a gold medal for inventing a mosquito-bar, which also catches rats.

"Judge Smith," said the President in a solemn voice, "dar are few little things I desiah to spoke to you about. You war at de pos'offis de odder day to rent a box at $2.50 per quarter. All de mail dat you receive in six months wouldn't light a kerosene lamp. Den why dis attempt to frow on style an' heap on agony?"

"A few days ago," continued the president, "I oberheard you trottin' out a presidential candidate for 1884. You had your biggest voice, an' you was flingin' your arms about, an' one would have thought you knowed all about it. Judge Smith, you will have no mo' to do wid de makin' of de nex' president of de United States dan one grain of sand will have in makin' up de great Sahary desert."

"No, sah—dot's so, sah."

"Let dis be a warnin' to you, sah. From dis time on you have no candidate, doan want one, an' take no interes' in polyticks beyond what can be 'spected of ebery citizen. If any man axes you to tell him who am to be de nex' president doan' you do it. Keep dat information locked tight in your bussum: An' a day or two ago you denounced yourself as an advocate of a tariff. Judge Smith, do you know what a tariff is?"

"N—not zactly, sah, but I was gwine to read up on it."

"Exactly; an' perhaps you'd better read up on how to keep your mouf shet on what you doan' know and what doan' affeck you! You am a purty lookin' advocate, you am! While your wife needs shoes an' de chil'en want clothes you walk aroun' de market wid yer old white obercoat on to tell de world dat you doan' 'blieve in dis or dat, or dat you am wedded to dis theory or opposed to dat one!

"See dat you do. Theories am all right onless a man am two months behind on his rent. Doctrines am all right when a family aint shiverin' wid the cold. Individual opinions count fur nuffin when de individual can't raise cash 'nuff to get a patch on his boot. Go and sot down, Judge Smith, an' doan loose a minit in startin on de road to reform."

First Man Killed on Free Soil.

D. Z. Shook, of Greencastle, Pa., sends to the Philadelphia Times the following account of the first fatal affray during Lee's invasion of Pennsylvania. The first man who fell upon free soil in the rebellion was killed at Greencastle, Pa., the first town on Lee's route to Gettysburg after he crossed Mason and Dixon's line. It was Corporal William H. Rihal, Company C, First New York Lincoln Cavalry. He and his company on the 22d of June, 1863, came as far as Greencastle, scouting. They drove the enemy's pickets before them until they reached this place, where they were met by a superior force of Jenkin's Cavalry and some infantry hidden in a field. The enemy fired into the Union scouts, killing Rihal instantly and wounding several others among whom was Sergeant Cafferty, who fell into the enemy's hands and lay at a citizen's house near by until his wounds healed. Rihal was a Philadelphian, but was in a New York company. His body was buried in a field where it fell, but was afterward disinterred and buried in our cemetery by the citizens. We have asked the legislature for a monument to mark the resting-place of this hero, who was first to fall in the defense of his state and who shed the first blood that was drawn on free soil.

Henry Grosjean, French commissioner of agriculture to the United States, sailed from New York for home on Wednesday. He prophecies a great future for California wine, and declares we cheat ourselves by using foreign labels on our good wines.

THE SEVERED HEAD.

An Involuntary Crime.

I was born in Constantinople. My father was dragoman of the port, and carried on a profitable business in silks and perfumes. He gave me a good education, and as I showed ability I was sent to Paris to study medicine, where I remained three years and learned all that a good physician must know. I made few friends, and was finally overpowered by homesickness. As I heard nothing from my father, I seized the opportunity to return as surgeon in the train of a French embassy.

I found my father dead, and the priest said: "Your father died a holy man, for he bequeathed us his money for alms.' This was incomprehensible, yet what could I do? I had no witness against him, and must be glad he did not look upon the house and my father's merchandise as legacies also. I gained no reputation as a physician, because I was ashamed to make a mountebank of myself. I sorely missed my father, who would have led me among the rich and great, who now had no thought for the poor Zalenkos. My father's goods found no sale either, for his patronage had departed elsewhere after his death, and new trade comes slowly. Discouraged, I was once meditating over my situation, when it occurred to me that I had seen my countrymen traveling in France with goods which sold at a great profit because they were foreign. So I sold my family mansion, left half the proceeds in charge of a faithful friend, and with the remainder bought things which are rare in France, such as shawls, silks, salves, and oils. I then embarked again for France.

My luck changed at once. The voyage was quick and prosperous. I traveled through the large and small French cities and found ready customers for my wares. My friend sent me a fresh stock of goods, and I made money. So success encouraged me to go to Italy. My medical knowledge aided me greatly. On reaching a town I would announce the arrival of a Greek doctor who had cured many people, and my balsams and medicines brought money. So I came at last to Florence. I decided to remain there a long time partly because I liked the city, and partly to recover from the fatigue of travel. I hired a shop in the St. Ceroc quarter, and two rooms opening on a balcony in a hotel near by. I then distributed circulars, advertising myself as physician and merchant, and had scarcely opened my shop before it was thronged.

I had been in Florence four days, when one night, after closing my shop and waiting only to take my usual account of stock, I found in a little box a note which I did not remember having put there. I opened it and found an invitation to be on the bridge called Ponte Vecchio that night punctually at twelve. I resolved to go, and, as precaution, to take my sabre.

When it was nearly midnight I started, and soon reached the Ponte Vecchio. I looked down on the shimmering waves of the Arno. The church-bells rang twelve. I looked around, and before me stood a large man wholly enveloped in a red cloak, a corner of which he held before his face. At first I was startled at his sudden appearance behind me, but I collected myself, and said:

"If you called me here, state what you desire."

The red cloak turned, and exclaimed in a low voice: "Follow!"

Uneasy at going alone with the unknown, I stood still and said: "Not so, dear sir, until you first show me whither. Can you not show me your face?"

But the red cloak replied, with coldness: "If you will not go, Zelankos, stay here," and turned to depart.

This angered me. "Do you think," I cried, "a man like me allows himself to be humbugged by any fool, and do you think that I have waited this cold night for nothing?"

In three bounds I had reached him. I grasped his cloak and laid my other hand on my sabre; but the cloak remained in my hand and the unknown had vanished round the next corner. My rage gradually cooled. I still had the cloak, and it should give me the key to this astonishing adventure. I put it on and went home. When I was scarcely a hundred steps distant from my house some one brushed against me and whispered in French: "Be careful, Count, there can be nothing done to-night." Before I could look around the person was already gone, and I saw only a shadow shifting along the houses.

I examined the cloak more closely. It was of heavy Genoese silk, purplish red, bordered with astrachen, and richly embroidered with geld. It's magnificent appearance gave me an idea which I resolved to carry out. I took it to my shop and exposed it for sale, but set so high a price upon it that I was sure to find no purchaser. My desire was to scrutinize sharply every one who asked its price, for the distinct though fleeting glimpse I had of the stranger's figure after he lost the cloak would enable me to recognize him among a thousand.

It remained in my window all day, admired by all. At last, toward evening, a young man came in who had often been there, and who had that day talked much about the cloak. He threw a purse of zechins on the counter, and cried:

"I must have that cloak if it beggars me!"

He began at once counting out his gold pieces. I was greatly embarrrased. I had exhibited the cloak merely to catch the eye of the unknown, and here came a young fool to pay the exorbitant price. What could I do? I yielded, for, at all events, I was glad to get such payment for my night's adventure.

The young man put on the cloak and departed; but, on the threshold he turned, while he loosened a paper fastened to the cloak and threw it to me saying:

I languidly picked it up, but, behold, there was written:

"Bring the cloak to-night, at the same hour, to the Ponte Vecchio. Four hundred zechins awaits you."

I was thunderstruck. But I did not reflect long. I gathered up the two hundred zechins and ran after the young man.

"Take your money again, good friend," I said, "and return me the cloak. I can not possibly let it go."

At first he thought it was a joke; but when he saw I was serious, he flew into a passion, and called me a fool. We came to blows, and I tore the cloak away and would have run off with it, but he called the police, and we were taken to court. The judge was astonished at the complaint, and adjudged the cloak to my foe.

I offered the young man twenty, fifty, eighty, yes, a hundred zechins above his two hundred, if he would let me have the garment. What my prayers would not accomplish my gold worked. He took my money, and I triumphantly carried away the cloak. I waited impatiently for midnight. At the same hour as on the previous night I carried the cloak under my arm to the Ponte Vecchio. At the last stroke of twelve a form emerged from darkness, unmistakeably the man of yesterday.

"Have you the cloak?" he asked.

"Yes," I replied; "but it cost me a hundred zechins, cash."

"I know it," he answered. "See, here are four hundred."

He stepped with me to the broad railing of the bridge, and counted down the gold pieces. There were four hundred. They shone splendidly in the the moonlight, their glitter rejoiced my heart. I pocketed the money, and tried to look more closely at the unknown, but he wore a mask, from which dark eyes darted sinister glances.

"I thank you, sir, for your goodness," I said. "What do you want now of me? But, as I told you before, it must be nothing wrong."

"Your fears are unnecessary," he answered, while he threw the cloak round his shoulders. "I require your help as a physician, yet not for the living, but for the dead."

"How can that be?" I cried, in amazement.

"I came with my sister from a distant land," he said, beckoning for me to follow him. "We resided here with a friend of our family. My sister died suddenly yesterday, of an illness, and the relatives want to bury her to-morrow. It is a rule with our family that all shall repose in the ancestral vault. I shall let my relatives retain her body, but I must carry my father his daughter's head, that he may once more see her."

The idea of decapitating a woman was terrible to me, but I dared not to object for fear of offending the unknown. So I told him I was familiar with the process of embalming, and begged him to lead the way. Still, I could not help asking why this must all be done so secretly and at night.

He said his purpose was abhorrent to the relatives, who, if it were done by day, would prevent it. But only once have the head removed, and they could say no more. He would have brought the head to me, but a brother's scruples restrained him from severing it.

At last we reached a splendid mansion, which my companion pointed out as our destination. We passed the main entrance, entered a small door, which the unknown carefully closed behind him, and in darkness, climbed a narrow stairway leading to a dimly lighted hall. Passing through this, we arrived at a room lighted by a lamp suspended from the ceiling. In this room stood a bed, on which lay the corpse. The unknown averted his face to conceal his emotion. He pointed to the bed, and telling me to do my business well and quickly, left the room.

I drew out my knife, which, as surgeon, I always carried with me, and approached the bed. Only the head of the corpse was visible, but this was so beautiful that the deepest compassion seized me. The dark hair hung down in long braids, the face was pale, the eyes closed. I first made an incision in the skin, after the manner of surgeons when they amputate a limb. Then I took my sharp knife, and with one blow cut through the throat.

But, to my horror, the woman opened her eyes, immediately closed them again, and, in one deep groan, breathed her last. At the same instant a torrent of hot blood shot toward me from the wound.

I had killed the poor creature! I stood some minutes in frightful anxiety. Then, overpowered with terror, I rushed shuddering from the room. But the hall was dark, the light was extinguished no trace of my companion was discovered, and I groped hap-hazard along the wall to find the stairs. I reached them at last, and descended, half falling, half sliding. There was no one below. I found the door only latched, and at once gained the street. Spurred by fear, I ran to my home, and buried myself in bed to forget my horrible deed. But sleep was out of the question, and soon morning warned me to deliberate on my situation. It seemed likely that the man who had persuaded me into committing what now appeared a madman's deed, would not accuse me. I resolved to open my shop, and, as far as possible, appear unconcerned.

But, alas! a new circumstance increased the hedge of difficulties. My cap and my belt, as also my knife, were missing, and I was uncertain whether I had left them in the chamber of the dead, or lost them in my flight.

I opened my shop at the usual time. A neighbor, passing by, exclaimed:

"Oh! what do you think of the terrible murder that occurred last night?"

I feigned ignorance.

"What! Don't you know that the Fower of Florence, Bianca, the governor's daughter, was assassinated last night? I saw her only yesterday, going gaily through the streets with her betrothed, for to-day was to have been her wedding-day."

Each word was a stab. All my acquaintances in town came and told me the same story, each version more dreadful than the last, but none so awful as what I had seen. About noon an officer came and took me aside.

"Signor Zalenkos," he said, drawing forth the articles I had missed, "do these things belong to you?"

I considered whether I should deny it, but as I saw through the half-open door my landlord and other acquaintances who could testify against me, I decided not to make matters worse by a lie, and therefore acknowledged the ownership. The officer took me to prison. Two hours after my arrest I was led from my cell, down many stairs to a great hall. Twelve old men sat around a long table draped in black. Seats around three sides of the hall were filled with the most distinguished people of Florence. The upper galleries were crowded with spectators. When I approached the table, a man with a grave, sad demeanor arose; it was the governor. He spoke to the assemblage, saying that he, as father of the murdered girl, could not act as judge on this occasion, and would therefore yield his position to the oldest of the senators. This man was at least ninety years, but his eyes were fiery, and his voice was strong. He began by asking me if I committed the murder, I begged for a hearing, and related boldly and distinctly what I had done and what I knew. During my story the governor grew alternately pale and red, and, as I concluded started up in a frenzy:

"Monster!" he cried; "so you would lay a crime that you committed from avarice upon some else?"

The senator rebuked him for interposing, since he had voluntarily resigned his rights. It was not shown that I acted from covetousness, for by his own statement nothing had been stolen from the dead. He went further, and declared that the governor must give an account of his daughter's early life, for only thus could it be decided whether I had told the truth or not. He adjourned court to examine the murdered girl's letters, delivered to him by her father. I was led back to prison, where I passed a sad day, only hoping that some connection might be discovered between the dead woman and the man of the red cloak.

Next day I hopefully entered the court-room. Many letters lay on the table. The old senator asked me whether they were in my handwriting. I looked at them found they were written by the same hand who wrote me the two notes. I told the senators this, but they did not heed, and said I must have written them, as the signature was "Z," the initial letter of my name. But the letter contained threats against the life of the dead girl, and warnings against her approaching wedding.

The governor seemed to have some mysterious information concerning me. They dealt with me suspiciously and rigorously. To vindicate myself I called for my papers, which must be in my room, but was told they had sought there and found nothing. So all hope vanished.

The third day I was convicted of premediated murder, and the death-sentence was read. I had come to this—forsaken, far from home, to die in my prime by the axe!

The evening of the dreadful day that decided my fate I sat in my solitary cell, thinking on my coming death, when the door opened and a man entered who contemplated me in silence for some time.

"Is it in this plight I find you again, Zalenkos?"

I had not recognized him by my dim lamp, but the sound of his voice revived old memories. It was Valetty, one of the few friends I knew during my student-life in Paris. He said he happened to come to Florence, where his father resided, who was a man of great respectability. He had heard my story, and came to see me once more, and learn from me how I could have committed so awful a deed.

I told him all about it. He was amazed, and adjured me to tell him, my sole friend, everything, and not pass away with falsehood on my lips. I swore to him by the holiest oaths that I spake the truth, that my only error was in being so blinded by the glint of gold that I had not seen the improbability of the unknown's story.

"So you never knew Bianca?" he asked.

I assured him I had never seen her. Valetty now told me that a deep mystery shrouded the affair. The governor had hastened my trial, and there was a rumor that I had long known Bianca, and had murdered her from revenge for her marrying another. I told him this all fitted the red cloak, but I could not prove his share in the deed. Greatly moved, Valetty embraced me, and promised to do everything to save my life.

I had little hope, but I knew Valetty was wise and understood law, and would do all he could to rescue me. I was in suspense two long days. At last Valetty appeared.

"I bring encouragement, yet of a painful sort. You will live, and be set at liberty, but with the loss of one hand."

Overcome with emotion, I thanked my friend for having saved my life. He said the governor had been inexhorable and would not allow another trial; but finally, not to appear unjust, he had agreed that if a similar case might be found among the Florentine archives, my punishment might be the same which had then been inflicted. Valetty and his father had been reading the old records day and night, and at last had found a precisely similar case, where the sentence ran:

"His left hand must be cut off, his property confiscated, and he himself forever banished."

So ran my sentence now, and I was to prepare immediately for the fearful ordeal which awaited me. I will not describe the horror of the scene when I stood in the open market-place and laid my hand on the block, where the life-blood leaped from me in torrents.

Valetty took me to his house until I recovered, and then generously provided me with money for traveling expenses, since all my property had been seized by law.

I went to Sicily and took the first ship for Constantinople. My hope now lay in the sum I had given my friend. I begged him to let me reside with him, but he astonished me by asking why I did not go to my own house. He said a strange man had bought in my name a house in the Greek quarter, and told the neighbors I was coming soon. I went immediately with my friend and was welcomed by old acquaintances. One of the merchants gave me a letter, which the man who bought the house left for me. I read:

Zalencos: Two hands are ready to work without ceasing that you may not feel the loss of one. The house and all in it are yours, and each year you will receive enough to place you among the richest of your people. Forgive one who is more unfortunate than you.

I could not imagine who had written it. The merchant answered my questions with: "He appeared to be a Frenchman; he wore a red cloak."

I knew enough to understand that the unknown was not quite lost to all honorable feeling. I found everything in my new house arranged in the best manner; and a shop stocked with goods finer than I ever had.

Ten years have passed, and more from habit than necessity, I go on my journeys with my wares; but I have never again seen the land of my great misfortune. Every year I receive a thousand gold pieces. But the burden on my soul can not be lifted. The terrible picture of the murdered Bianca is forever in my mind.—Translated from the German for the Argonaut.

A RIVAL OF THE YOSEMITE.

The Foot of White Man Finds Its Way Into a Reign of Unsurpassed Grandeur.

From the San Luis Republic,

About three weeks ago R. D. Cook became alarmed at the long dry spell and, in company with another gentleman, he started for the headwaters of the Sisquoc in search of food for his stock. He reports the scenery along the route after he left civilization as exceedingly grand, rivaling anything he ever saw in his life, and he volunteered the information that he had twice crossed the plans and been through Central America. After riding as far as they could they left their horses and footed it over the mountains and through canyons, and near the headwaters of one of the tributaries of the Sisquoc they found themselves upon the brink of a precipice, over which the waters of the creek poured with a deafening roar, falling a distance of 600 to 700 feet. He threw a rock over the brink to test the distance and waited to hear it strike the bottom, but after waiting some time he concluded it had lodged on the way down, and was turning to leave when the rumbling intonations told him it had just reached the bottom. The view from this point was grand and awe-inspiring, and if properly opened to the public would rival the Yosemite as an attraction. Fish and game abound, and to illustrate the plentifulness of the former he stated that his companion on several occasions took a common gunny sack and fastened it to a rifle and would drive enough fish into it while he was making a fire to serve them for a meal.

In coming down a canyon they discovered a redwood forest that has never before been known to exist in that locality. He describes its extent to be from two and a half to three miles long and from three-quarters to one mile wide. The trees were from one to six feet in diameter and to use his own words, "there is enough timber there to fence this valley into ten acre lots." He is confident that no other white man ever stepped feet inside the grove, for, said he, it would have been impossible to have reached it a year ago, but about that time a forest fire burned off the thick underbrush and made it possible for them to reach the grove on foot.

Selected Varieties.

There are in London ninety-three recognized clubs having over nineteen thousand members, who, on the average, pay an annual subscription of $25. The total income of these clubs is estimated to reach $3,000,000 a year.

An inventor has obtained a patent in England for the manufacture of what he dignifies by the name "wine." It is a mixture of cane-sugar and glucose, colored with certain dyewoods, orchella weed; sorcel paste, etc., according to fancy, and subjected to fermentation. Similar mixtures are made abroad, and made so cunningly that upon analyzing they show no products but what are found in the genuine juice of the grape.

The Spanish army consists of 134,000 men, of whom 94,000 are in Spain, and the rest in the Spanish West Indies.

A disagreeable comparison is presented to the English people by the Irish Register General's returns of illegitimate births, which are but 0.8 per cent. of the total number in Connaught; 1.8 in Munster, and 2.2 in Leinster, while in the strong Protestant county of Down the highest figure, over 6 per cent., is reached. In Lancashire, in England, the pes centage of illegitimacy is over 20,

To show that country people may be too sharp for city folks, the Richmond (Va.) Religious Herald adduces the following: "The other day a pastor and several of his head men went out to take a collection at a country church for the new church in the city. Pretty soon after the city clique reached the country church some of the country sisters besieged them for a contribution to buy a new suit of clothes for their pastor. The upshot of it was that the finely dressed city brethren had to borrow money to get back home."

"I had one insane man under nearly incessant observation," wrote the late Dr. Leserques, the famous French doctor. "He was a cultivated patient, seemingly quite sane and highly intelligent. I visited him three times a day. He implored me to have him set at liberty. One minute with the most persuasive eloquence and the next with irrefutable logic—so irrefutable that at the end of eight months I gave the certificate of freedom. Two days after with one stroke of the knife he killed his wife."

The value of the chief art collections of Paris is estimated as follows: The Duc d' Aumale, $15,000,000; the Baron de Rothschild, $10,000,000; Sir Richard Wallace, $8,000,000; M. Secretan, $2,000,000, including thirty pictures by Meissonier; M. Defoer-Bey and the Count de Greffuhle, each $600,000; Madame Cossin, $1,000,000; and M. Edouard Andre and Mr. William Stewart, $400,000 each.

The mayor of Chicago is perfectly satisfied with that city. He said in a speech lately that "Chicago is one of the grandest cities in the world, and is yet destined to be the centre of enlightenment as well as of industry. The various nationalities present by intermarriage would yet produce a type of manhood unequaled in the world." Disclaiming the idea of Chicago's wickedness, the mayor continued: "It is a newspaper lie. It is the best and most moral city to be found on earth, because its citizens are so busy that they have not time to do anything wrong."

One of the most painful phases of Washington life, according to a correspondent, is the presence of "old, battered wrecks, that the waves and winds of politics have cast ashore from time to time." Forced out of public life, these ne'er do wells" settle in Washington and drift from bad to worse. Ex-Senators, ex-cabinet officers, ex-generals are seen "so seedy and dilapidated that they will cross the street rather than meet an old friend," so poor and helpless that they are often hungry, without a cent to buy food." In spite of the pathos of the fact, one cannot help feeling that men who are capable of such degradation are better out of office than in.

Cornell university resents the imputation of some of its alumni that it is not expending its rich heritage for the promotion of "the higher education," etc. The defense offered by two of the trustees seems conclusive. The property of the university is said now to be worth $7,000,000, and its annual income $400,000. Appreciation of western lands has in a very short period made it one of the richest institutions of learning in the world.

Post-mortem Autobiography.

"Gimme a little straight poison. More'n that. I want to feel my licker. There, that'll do. Yes, I'm from the west. From California, and what d'you want to say about it?" The speaker was tall and angular. He wore his trousers in his boot-legs, and under the broad rim of his slouch hat were partially concealed a very red face and a much redder nose, which other elements than those of nature had assisted to color. He leaned his broad back against the bar in a down-town Bowery saloon and the moisture ran off his hat and formed a little pool on the sawdust-covered floor at his feet. "What'll you take, boys?" he continued. "This is my drink. Step up right lively now. Here is ho! Been round some? Well, somewhat. Seen some 'citement? Well, if I have not—Lemme see: near onto forty years ago up in Michigan I trapped beaver one season. Dead of winter, snow on the ground, and the creeks full of ice One morning I went down to the traps to see after the ketch. I laid my gun on the bank and went down to the water. Somehow or 'nuther I looked over my shoulder and my heart came flopping right into my mouth. An Indian buck stood about a rod from me with his tomahawk in his hand ready to brain me. Here, bar-keeper, 'nuther round. Give me some of the same. Well, I jumped across the creek and dodged behind a big tree. I peeked out. There was the Indian right onto me. I left there in a hurry and made for a pile of rocks. Hid behind a big boulder. Looked over the edge. There was the Indian right after me. I begin to see it was life or death, and ran like a deer across the open country to another batch of timber, dodged around the trees, and jumped into the water up to my neck. I squinted over a log which was lyin' across the creek, and I'll be blanked if there wasn't the buck about a yard off. Give us some more licker, bar-keeper. There, there, don't give me your whole shop; a pint's enough for me at one drink."

"Well," queried a nervous little man, with watery eyes and a bulbous nose, who had taken a deep interest in the tale, "What did the Indian do then?"

"Oh, he killed me."—New York Times.

Greatest at the Dinner Table.

From the Brooklyn Eagle.

In a bar room of a Washington hotel a gentleman was praising the wit and eloquence of a well known orator.

"I heard him in the senate and on the stump," he observed, "but he is always greatest at the dinner table."

"I bet you I know a greater one," chipped in an Omaha man present.

"I doubt it," returned the first speaker.

"You may doubt it if you will," said the party from the region of the setting sun, "but it's God's truth that I have known him to eat three pounds of steak at a single meal."

Various Kinds of Drunkards.

Some men seem to become drunk suddenly, giving no previous indication by thickness of articulation or unsteadiness of gait; this being commonly the case where mental excitement from other causes—as a heated discussion—prevails at the time. The most dreadful and astounding cases are afforded by those unfortunate people who are never sober. How they manage to survive so long as they do is a mystery. There are men who have been perpetually under the influence of liquor for twenty or thirty years. Of course, the brain must have become permanently injured, so that we may infer that the drink these persons now take has little or no real effect on them, and that their state would be just the same without it. Others, again, are systematic and punctual drunkards of regular habits, men who take their quantum and are put to bed unconscious every night, yet are capable of attending to their daily business in the most extraordinary manner. These, as a rule, never exceed a certain amount by so much as a glass, and do not suffer so much as intermittent drunkards—at any rate not so soon, for the inevitable consequence is only a little longer deferred. The writer knew an old doctor in Jamaica who used to aver that the climate was the finest in the world. "Yellow fever, sir!" he would exclaim—"not a bit of it! A vulgar chimera! A malicious libel on us! The fact is, its the vicious irregular drinking habits of the people here that kills 'em. Look at me! I drink a bottle of brandy every night, and have done so for thirty years. I get tipsy seven times a week, in an orderly and decent manner; and I've never had yellow fever nor a day's illness! And to all appearances he was a fine healthy man of sixty-five or seventy years, with a beard as white as snow. Yet he was carried off suddenly by a trifling indisposition incidental to the climate, and it was found on examination of his papers after death that his age was only fifty-two.

It does not by any means follow, either, that because a man is never intoxicated he may not be drinking too much. Men employed in the great breweries in London, especially the draymen, consume an enormous quantity of beer. The daily allowance which their employers give them is very large, but they rarely confine themselves to that; and the draymen, in addition, get much gratuitously from the customers to whom they are always delivering the casks; so that ten or fourteen quarts is no exceptional consumption for one man; yet they are not drunkards, in the ordinary sense of the term. The very nature of their work necessitates the employment of none but steady men, strength being also a sine qua non. But if one of these men should break a limb or get confined to bed from any other accident, he is always sure to get delirium tremens, and a scalp wound frequently kills him. Brewers' men are notorious in hospitals as being the worst cases for operation, being prone to exhibit all the most dangerous complications which fetter the success of surgical treatment.—Chambers' Journal.

Great Conversers.

The practice of expressing one's ideas before the public is so near of kin to conversation that it might readily be supposed the two talents would go together. Generally they have done so. Sheridan was a most brilliant and fascinating speaker, and his conversation was of the same kind. It was said of him that he used to lie abed of a morning and think up puns, repartees and smart things generally for the day, carefully refraining them in mind and then leading up the conversation to a point at which one or more good things could be let off, like fire-crackers. But Sheridan was a notable man in every respect, One night, while the House of Commons was crowded to suffocation to hear him speak on an announced topic, one London theater was giving the "School for Scandal," another "The Critic," and a third "The Rivals," and no other author ever enjoyed so much popularity in his own day as he; Burke was as great in the drawing-room as on the opposition bench. He was Johnson's leading opponent in whatever topic might come up, and was almost sure to take the other side just for the sake of the argument. He could hardly be said to converse, however; he rather harangued, and was fond of going into the depths of the subject, and when it is remembered that he knew nearly everything, and insisted on telling all he knew, the terrors of starting him on a down-grade with the throttle valve wide open, are easily seen and appreciated. The elder Pitt talked as well as he spoke, but his son was not so gifted, and used to say he had no time to spend in idle words. He did not seem to share the opinion of Napoleon, that conversation was the best means of getting at the truth. The little corporal was no great talker himself, but whenever he wanted to study out any subject, he always assembled a number of men who understood it and in one way or another got them to wrangle over it, when the truth was bound to come out. Whenever Napoleon did talk he said something worth remembering. Fox spent more time in talk than in anything else, and talked for the love of it. But talkers have not always been orators, though orators have generally been talkers. Macauley was no orator, though a talker of the purest water. Sidney Smith called him a "book in breeches," and was not far wrong, since Macauley's gift in conversation somewhat resembled those of Burke.—St. Louis Globe-Democrat.

New England Life in 1784.

The furniture in the dwellings at Boston was often imported from England. The sideboards were heavy with articles of porcelain and china, many of them of the celebrated Wedgwood ware, whereon blue lovers walked by the side of blue waters and blue deer lay down to rest in the shade of blue trees. * * * In the corners of the rooms or on the landing of the stairs stood the high clocks of English make, many of which yet remain to attest the excellence of the manufacture. Some were surmounted by and allegorical representation of Time. * * * The library was a strange assortment of good books and books so gone out of fashion that no second hand dealer will buy them, Hugh volumes, long since out of print, and now to be found, covered with dust, on the back shelves of public libraries, were then in high favor. Among the sober and sedate readers of Boston Puritancial taste was yet strong. The delightful novels of Richardson, of Fielding, of Smollett, and of Sterne found no place on their shelves. Reading was a more serious business. Many a young damsel passed from girlhood to womanhood without ever having looked within the covers of Shakespeare, or Sheridan, without ever having attended be thrown open, through which the two young ladies made their entree into the salon with their arms encircling each other and proceeded to execute a series of pirouettes round the room ending at last with a graceful courtesy before Mme. de Talleyrand. This was comparatively an innocent oddity on her part, although it bored her guests. Her second oddity was more mischievous and caused great offense. She would frequently during her evening reptions ring the bell and order her groom of the chambers to say that she was not at home, and after the lapse of a quarter of an hour or twenty minutes she would ring the bell again and give a counter order. The consequence was that husbands who called for their wives had to go home without them, and wives who came in search of their husbands could find no admittance; and all that Talleyrand could say, when a diplomatist of the highest rank remonstrated with him, was "Mais mon cher, que voulez-vous que je fasse, ma femme est si bete." We take the truth of the matter to be that Mme. de Talleyrand was at times a little crazy. She was a native of the East Indies, and Bonaparte, who was annoyed with her Robinson Crusoe story, which went the round of the Parisian salons, pronounced her to be "une sotte et d'une grossiere ignorance," and shortly after forbid her appearance at his Court because she had received a douceur from the merchants of Genoa. Had she not been a little crazy she would never have venture on the bold step by which she made the aquaintance of Talleyrand, at that time Minister of Foreign Affairs under the Directorate, and subsequently nearly compromised him as her husband with Bonaparte by accepting 4000,000f, from the Genoese, who hoped thereby to obtain some commercial advantages through her influence.—Temple Bar.

Talleyrand's Wife.

We have spoken of the Countess Edmund de Talleyrand, nee Princess de Sagan, as the great lady of Prince Tallyerand's household. The French Embassy had need of her redeeming qualities to render the prince's soirees tolerable to the high-class members of Viennese society. Talleyrand had been accompanied to Vienna by Mme. de Talleyrand, whose eccentricities were hardly compatible with perfect soundness of mind. The adventures of this lady before she became Mme. de Talleyrand have been the subject of much discussion, and we do not regard the well-known story of her having confounded the celebrated French traveler Denon with Robinson Crusoe as anything more than a laughable blunder on her part, resulting from her having hastily skimmed the wrong book of travels preparatory to her reception of M. Dinon at the prince's table, But, however stout a champion Mme. de Talleyrand may have had in M. Amedee Pichot, who contends that the story of Robinson Crussoe is the only evidence of the sottise or beties of Mme. de Talleyrand, she had some very odd moments while he did the honors of the Prince's salons during the congress. We shall content ourselves with citing two anecdotes on the faith of a most trustworthy eye-witness. The Princess had two young nieces in her suite who had not yet entered their teens. Her practice was on the evenings of her reptions, when a sufficient company had assembled, to direct a pair of folding doors to a dance, and could not tell whether the ace of spades was black or white, or if the king outranked the knave. * * * On the stalls on a market day we would miss again, many of the fruits and vegetables now considered not as luxuries but as essentials. The tomato was not only uncultivated but almost unknown. Apples and pears were to be had in abundance, but none of these excellent varieties—the result of long and assiduous nursing, grafting and transplanting—which are now to be had of every greengrocer. The whortleberries and strawberries were such as grew wild on the hills, and the best of them could bear comparison neither in flavor nor in size with the poorest that are often to be seen et country fairs. Oranges and bananas were the luxury of the rich, and were, with all the tropical fruits, rarely seen, for few packets could then make the voyage to the West Indies under several weeks. Since that day our dinner tables have been enriched by the cauliflower and egg plant. No great companies existed as yet for the distribution of ice. Every thunderstorm curdled the milk. The New England farmer held it an abomination to read a novel, to see a play, to go to a dance, to make a jest, to sing a comic song, to eat a dinner cooked on Sunday, or to give a present on Christmas day. Yet he would at times so far forget his austerity as to play a game of draught with his wife, or have a romp of fox and and geese with his children. His conscience did not smite him when he drank palm tea at a quilting, or listened to the achievements of his better half at the spinning match. He drank ale and cider at the apple paring bees and and laughed as loudly as any one when, at the corn husking, the lucky finder of the red ear kissed his favorite daughter. But the moment the fiddles were produced he went home to his pipe and sermons, or a long talk with the schoolmaster.—McMaster's History.

A PICTURE.

There was a windless mere, on whose smooth breast
A little island, flushed with purple bloom,
Lay gently cradled like a moorhen's nest;
It glowed like some rich jewel 'mid the gloom
Of sluggish leagues of peat and black morass,
Without a shrub or tree or blade of grass.

But on the isle itself the birch was seen
With its ethereal foliage, like some haze
Floating among the rowan's vivid green;
The ground with fern all feathered, and ablaze
With heath's and harebell's hyacinthine hue,
Was mirrored in the wave's intenser blue.

THE GENTLEMAN BEGGAR.

AN ATTORNEY'S STORY.

One morning, many years ago, I called by appointment on Mr. John Balance, the fashionable pawnbroker, to accompany him to Liverpool, in pursuit for a Levanting customer—for Balance, in addition to pawning, does a little business in the 60 per cent line. It rained in torrents when the cab stopped at the passage which leads past the pawning boxes to his private door. The cabman rang twice, and at length Balance appeared, looming through the mist and rain in the entry, illuminated by his perpetual cigar. As I eyed him rather impatiently, remembering that trains wait for no man, something like a hairy dog or bundle of rags, rose up at his feet, and barred his passage for a moment. Then Balance cried out with an exclamation, in answer apparently to a something I could not hear, "What, man alive! slept in the passage! there, take that and get some breakfast, for heaven's sake!" So saying, he jumped into the "hansom," and we bowled away at ten miles an hour, just catching the express as the doors of the station were closing. My curiosity was full set; for although Balance can be free with his money, it is not exactly to beggars that his generosity is usually displayed; so when comfortably ensconced in a coupe, I finished with:

"You are liberal with your money this morning; pray, how often do you give silver to street cadgers? because I shall know what walk to take when flats and sharps leave off buying law."

Balance, who would have made an excellent parson if he had not been bred to a case-hardening trade, and has still a soft bit left in his heart that is always fighting with his hard heart, did not smile at all, but looked as grim as if squeezing a lemon into his Saturday night's punch. He answered slowly: "A cadger—yes, a beggar—a miserable wretch, he is now; but let me tell you, Master David, that that miserable bundle of rags was born and bred a gentleman; the son of a nobleman, the husband of an heiress, and has sat and dined at tables where you and I, Master David, are only allowed to view the plate by favor of the butler. I have lent him thousands, and been well paid. The last thing I had from him was his court suit, and I hold now his bill for £100, that will be paid, I expect, when he dies."

"Why, what nonsense you are talking! You must be dreaming this morning. However, we are alone; I'll light a weed, in defiance of railway law; you shall spin that yarn; for, true or untrue, it will fill up the time to Liverpool."

"As for yarn," replied Balance, "the whole story is short enough; and as for truth, that you may easily find out if you like to take the trouble. I thought the poor wretch was dead, and I own it put me out meeting him this morning, for I had a curious dream last night."

"Oh, hang your dreams! Tell us about this gentleman beggar that bleeds you of half-crowns—that melts the heart even of a pawnbroker."

"Well, then, that beggar is the illegitimate son of the late marquis of Hoopborough by a Spanish lady of rank. He received a first-rate education and was brought up in his father's house. At a very early age he obtained an appointment in a public office, was presented by the marquis at court and received into the first society, where his handsome person and agreeable manners made him a great favorite. Soon after coming of age he married the daughter of Sir E. Bumper, who brought him a very handsome fortune, which was strictly settled on herself. They lived in splendid style, kept several carriages, a house in town and a place in the country. For some reason or other, idleness, or to please his lady's pride, he resigned his appointment. His father died and left him nothing; indeed, he seemed at that time very handsomely provided for.

"Very soon Mr. and Mrs. Molinos Fitz Roy began to disagree. She was cold, correct—he was hot and random. He was quite dependent on her, and she made him feel it. When he began to get into debt he came to me. At length some shocking quarrel occurred; some case of jealousy on the wife's side, not without reason, I believe, and the end of it was Mr. Fitz Roy was turned out of doors. The house was his wife's, the furniture was his wife's and the fortune was his wife's—he was, in fact, her pensioner. He left with a few hundred pounds ready money and some personal jewelry and went to a hotel. On these and credit he lived. Being illegitimate he had no relations; being a fool, when he spent his money he lost his friends. The world took his wife's part, when they found she had the fortune, and the only parties who interfered were her relatives, who did their best to make the quarrel incurable. To crown all, one night he was run over by a cab, was carried to a hospital and lay there for months, and was, during several weeks of the time, unconscious. A message to the wife, by the hands of one of his debauched companions, sent by a humane surgeon, obtained an intimation that 'if he died, Mr. Croak, the undertaker to the family, had orders to see to the funeral,' and that Mrs. Molinos was on the point of starting for the continent, not to return for some years. When Fitz Roy was discharged he came to me, limping on two sticks, to pawn his court suit, and told me his story. I was really sorry for the fellow, such a handsome, thoroughbred-looking man. He was going then into the West somewhere, to try to hunt out a friend. 'What to do, Balance,' he said, 'I don't know. I can't dig, and unless somebody will make me their gamekeeper I must starve, or beg, as my Jezebel bade me when we parted.'

"I lost sight of Molinos for a long time, and when I next came upon him it was in the Rookery of Westminster, in a low lodging house, where I was searching with an officer for stolen goods. He was pointed out to me as the 'gentleman cadger,' because he was so free with his money when 'in luck.' He recognized me, but turned away then. I have since seen him and relieved him more than once, although he never asks for anything. How he lives, heaven knows. Without money, without friends, without useful education of any kind, he tramps the country, as you saw him, perhaps doing a little hop-picking or hay-making, only happy when he obtains the means to get drunk. I have heard through the kitchen whispers that you know come to me, that he is entitled to some property, and I expect if he were to die his wife would pay the £100 bill I hold; at any rate, what I have told you I know to be true, and the bundle of rags I relieved just now is known in every thieves' lodging as the 'gentleman cadger.'"

This story produced an impression on me. I am fond of speculation and like the excitement of a legal hunt as much as some do a fox chase. A gentleman, a beggar, a wife rolling in wealth, rumors of unknown property due to the husband; it seemed as if there was pickings for me amidst this carrion of pauperism. Before returning from Liverpool I had purchased the gentleman beggar's acceptance from Balance. I then inserted in the Times the following advertisement: "Horace Molinos Fitz Roy. If this gentleman will apply to David Discount, Esq., solicitor, St. James', he will hear of something to his advantage. Any person furnishing Mr. F.'s address shall receive £1 1s reward. He was last seen, etc." Within twenty-four hours I had ample proof of the wide circulation of the Times. My office was besieged by beggars of every degree, men and women, lame and blind, Irish, Scotch and English, some on crutches, some in bowls, some in go-carts. They all knew him as the "gentleman," and I must do the regular fraternity of tramps the justice to say, that not one would answer a question until he made certain that I meant the "gentleman" no harm.

One evening about three weeks after the appearance of the advertisement, my clerk announced "another beggar." There came in an old man leaning on a staff, clad in soldier's gray-coat all patched and torn, with a battered hat, from under which a mass of tangled hair fell over his shoulders, and half concealed his face. The beggar, in a weak, wheezy, hesitating tone, said: "You have advertised for Molinos Fitz-Roy. I hope you don't mean him any harm; he is sunk, I think, too low for enmity now; and surely no one would sport with such misery as his." These last words were uttered in a sort of piteous whisper.

I answered quickly. "Heaven forbid I should sport with misery; I mean and hope to do him good as well as myself."

"Then, sir, I am Molinos Fitz-Roy!"

While we were conversing, candles had been brought in. I have not very tender nerves—my head would not agree with them—but I own I started and shuddered when I saw and knew that the wretched creature before me was under thirty years of age and once a gentleman. Sharp, aquiline features, reduced to literal skin and bone, were begrimed and covered with dry fair hair; the white teeth of the half open mouth chattered with eagerness and made more hideous the foul pallor of the rest of the countenance. As he stood leaning on a staff half bent, his long, yellow, bony fingers clasped over the crutch head of his stick, he was indeed a picture of misery, famine, squalor, and premature age, too horrible to dwell upon. I made him sit down, and then sent for some refreshment, which he devoured like a ghoul, and set to work to unravel his story. It was difficult to keep to the point; but with pains I learned what convinced me that he was entitled to some property, whether great or small there is no evidence. On parting, I said, "Now, Mr. F., you must stay in town while I make proper inquiries. What allowance will be enough to keep you comfortably?"

He answered humbly, after much pressing, "Would you think ten shillings too much?"

I don't like, if I do these things at all, to do them shabbily, so I said: "Come every Saturday and you shall have a pound." He was profuse in his thanks, as all such men are as long as distress lasts.

I had previously learned that my ragged client's wife was in England living in a splendid house in Hyde Park gardens, under her maiden name. On the following day the earl of Owen called upon me, wanting £5,000 by 5 o'clock the same evening. It was a case of life or death with him, so I made my terms, and took advantage of his pressure to execute a coup de main. I proposed that he should drive me home to receive the money, calling at Mrs. Molinos', in Hyde Park gardens, on our way. I knew that the coronet and liveries of his father, the marquis, would insure me an audience with Mrs. Molinos Fitz-Roy.

My scheme answered. I was introduced into the lady's presence. She was, and probably is, a very stately, handsome woman, with pale complexion, high, solid forehead, regular features, thin, pinched, self-satisfied mouth. My interview was very short. I plunged into the middle of the affair, but had scarcely mentioned the word husband when she interrupted me with, "I presume you have lent this profligate person money, and you want me to pay you." She paused, and then said: "He shall not have a farthing." As she spoke her white face became scarlet.

"But, madam, the man is starving. I have strong reasons for believing he is entitled to property, and if you refuse any assistance I must take other measures." She rang the bell, wrote something rapidly on a card, and, as the footman appeared, pushed it toward me across the table with the air of touching a toad, saying: "There, sir, is the address of my solicitors; apply to them if you think you have any claim. Robert, show the person out, and take care he is not admitted again."

So far I had effected nothing; and, to tell the truth, felt rather crestfallen under the influence of that grand manner peculiar to certain great ladies and to all great actresses.

My next visit was to the attorneys, Messrs. Leasem & Fashun of Lincoln's Inn square, and there I was at home. I had had dealings with the firm before. They are agents for half the aristocracy, who always run in crowds like sheep after the same wine merchants, the same architects, the same horse dealers, and the same law agents. It may be doubted whether the quality of law and land management they got on this principle is equal to their wine and horses. At any rate, my friends of Lincoln's inn, like others of the same class, are distinguished by their courteous manners, deliberate proceedings, innocence of legal technicalities, long credit and heavy charges. Leasem, the elder partner, wears powder and a huge bunch of seals, lives in Queen square, drives a brougham, gives the dinners and does the cordial department. He is so strict in performing the latter duty, that he once addressed a poacher who had shot a duke's keeper, as "my dear creature," although he afterward hung him.

Fashun has chambers in St. James street, drives a cab, wears a tip and does the grand baba style.

My business lay with Leasem. The interviews and letter passing were numerous. However, it came at last to the following dialogue:

"Well, my dear Mr. Discount," began Mr Leasem, who hates me like poison, "I'm really very sorry that poor, dear Molinos—knew his father well; a great man, a perfect gentleman; but you know what women are, eh, Mr. Discount? My client won't advance a shilling; she knows it would only be wasted in low dissipation. Now, don't you think (this was said very insinuatingly)—don't you think he had better be sent to the workhouse; very comfortable accommodations there, I can assure you—meat twice a week, and excellent soup; and then, Mr. Discount, we might consider about allowing you something for that bill."

"Mr. Leasem, can you reconcile it to your conscience to make such an arrangement? Here's a wife rolling in luxury and a husband starving!"

"No, Mr. Discount, not starving; there is the workhouse, as I observed before; besides allow me to suggest that these appeals to feeling are quite unprofessional—quite unprofessional."

"But, Mr. Leasem, touching this property which the poor man is entitled to?"

"Why, there, again, Mr. D., you must excuse me; you really must. I don't say he is; I don't say he is not. If you know he is entitled to property, I am sure you know how to proceed. The law is open to you, Mr. Discount—the law is open, and a man of your talent will know how to use it."

"Then, Mr. Leasem, you mean that I must, in order to right this starving man, file a bill of discovery to extract from you the particulars of his rights. You have the marriage settlement and all the information, and you decline to allow a pension or afford any information; the man is to starve or go to the workhouse."

"Why, Mr. D., you are so quick and violent, it really is not professional; but you see (here a subdued smile of triumph) it has been decided that a solicitor is not bound to afford such information as you ask to the injury of his client."

"Then you mean that this poor Molinos may rot and starve, while you keep secret from him, at his wife's request, his title to an income, and that the court of chancery will back you in this iniquity."

I kept repeating the word "starve," because I saw it made my respectable opponent wince.

"Well, then, just listen to me. I know that in the happy state of your equity law, chancery can't help my client, but I have another plan: I will go hence to my office, issue a writ, take your client's husband in execution; as soon as he is lodged in jail I shall file his schedule in the insolvent court, and when he comes up for his discharge, I shall put you in the witness box and examine you on oath, 'touching property of which you know the insolvent to be possessed,' and where will be your privilege communication then?"

The respectable Leasem's face lengthened in a twinkling, his comfortable, confident air vanished, he ceased twiddling his gold chain, and, at length, he muttered:

"Suppose we pay the debt?"

"Why, then, I'll arrest him the day after for another."

"But, my dear Mr. Discount, surely such conduct would not be quite respectable."

"That's my business; my client has been wronged, I am determined to right him, and when the aristocratic firm of Leasem & Fashun takes refuge, according to the custom of respectable repudiators, in the cool arbors of the court of chancery, why, a mere bill discounting attorney like David Discount need not hesitate about cutting a bludgeon out of the insolvent court."

"Well, well, Mr. D., you are so warm—so fiery. We must deliberate; we must consult. You will give me until the day after to-morrow, and then we'll write you our final determination. In the meantime send us a copy of your authority to act for Mr. Molinos Fitz-Roy."

Of course I lost no time in getting the gentleman begger to sign a proper letter.

On the appointed day came a communication with L. and F. seal, which I opened, not without professional eagerness. It was as follows:

"In re Molinos Fitz-Roy and Another.

"Sir—I answer to your application on behalf of Mr. Molinos Fitz-Roy, we beg to inform you that under the administration of a paternal aunt who died intestate, your client is entitled to £2,500 8s. 6d., 3 per cents; £1,500 12s 4d., 3 per cents. Reduced: £1,000 long annuities; £500 bank stock, £3,500 India stock, besides other securities, making up about £10,000, which we are prepared to transfer over to Mr. Molinos Fitz-Roy's direction forthwith."

Here was a windfall! It quite took away my breath.

At dusk came my gentleman beggar, and what puzzled me was, how to break the news to him. Being very much overwhelmed with business that day, I had not much time for consideration. He came in rather better dressed than when I first saw him, with only a week's beard on his chin; but, as usual, not quite sober. Six weeks had elapsed since our first interview. He was still the humble, trembling, low-voiced creature I first knew him.

After a prelude, I said, "I find, Mr. F., you are entitled to something; pray, what do you mean to give me in addition to my bill, for obtaining it?" He answered rapidly, "Oh, take half; if there is £100, take half; if there is £500, take half."

"No, no, Mr. F., I don't do business in that way; I shall be satisfied with 10 per cent."

It was so settled. I then led him out into the street, impelled to tell him the news, yet dreading the effect; not daring to make the revelation in my office, for fear of a scene.

I began hesitatingly, "Mr. Fitz-Roy, I am happy to say that I find you are entitled to * * * £10,000!"

"Ten thousand pounds!" he echoed; "£10,000!" he shrieked; "£10,000!" he yelled, seizing my arm violently. "You are a brick. Here, cab! cab!" Several drove up—the shout might have been heard a mile off. He jumped in the first.

"Where to?" said the driver.

"To a tailor's, you rascal!"

"Ten thousand pounds! ha, ha, ha!" he repeated hysterically when in the cab, and every moment grasping my arm. Presently he subsided, looked me straight in the face, and muttered with agonizing terror.

"What a jolly brick you are!"

The tailor, the hosier, the bootmaker, the hair dresser, were in turn visited by this poor pagan of externals. As, by degrees, under their hands, he emerged from the beggar to the gentleman, his spirits rose; his eyes brightened; he walked erect, but always nervously grasping my arm; fearing apparently, to lose sight of me for a moment, lest his fortune should vanish with me. The impatient pride with which he gave his orders to the astonished tradesman for the finest and best of everything, and the amazed air of the fashionable hair dresser when he presented his matted locks and stubble chin, to be "cut and shaved," may be acted—it cannot be described.

By the time the external transformation was complete, and I sat down in a cafe in the Haymarket, opposite a haggard, but handsome, thoroughbred-looking man, whose air, with the exception of the wild eyes and deeply browned face, did not differ from the stereotyped men about town sitting around us, Mr. Molinos Fitz-Roy had already almost forgotten the past; he bullied the waiter and criticised the wine, as if he had done nothing else but dine and drink and scold there all the days of his life.

Once he wished to drink my health, and would have proclaimed his whole story to the coffee room assembly in a raving style. When I left he almost wept in terror at the idea of losing sight of me. But allowing for these ebullitions—the natural result of such a whirl of events—he was wonderfully calm and self-possessed.

The next day his first care was to distribute £50 among his friends, the cadgers, at a house of call in Westminster, and formerly to dissolve his connection with them; those present undertaking for the "fraternity" that for the future he should never be noticed by them in public or private. I cannot follow his career much farther. Adversity had taught him nothing. He was soon again surrounded by well-bred vampires, who had forgotten him when penniless; but they amused him, and that was enough. The £10,000 were rapidly melting when he invited me to a grand dinner at Richmond, which included a dozen of the most agreeable, good-looking well-dressed dandies of London, interspersed with a display of pretty butterfly bonnets. We dined deliciously, and drank as men do of iced wines in the dog days—looking down from Richmond hill.

One of the pink bonnets crowned Fitz-Roy with a wreath of flowers; he looked—less the intellect—as handsome as Alcibiades. Intensely excited and flushed, he rose with a champagne glass in his hand to propose my health.

The oratorical powers of his father had not descended to him. Jerking out sentences by spasms, at length he said, "I was a beggar—I am a gentleman—thanks to this——"

Here he leaned heavily on my shoulder a moment and then fell back. We raised him, loosened his neckcloth—

"Fainted!" said the ladies.

"Drunk!" said the gentlemen.

He was dead!

AN OLD TRAGEDY RECALLED.

The Death of Gen. Mackenzie's Mother Brings Up the Tragedy on the United States Brig Somers.

The death, as reported by telegraph on Saturday, of Mrs. Alexander Slidell Mackenzie, at the residence of her son, Brig. Gen. R. S. Mackenzie, U. S. A., Santa Fe, N. M., will recall to mind the excitement created some forty years ago, by the hanging of Spencer, Cromwell and Small on board the brig Somers, commanded by her distinguished husband, Commodore Alex Slidell Mackenzie. The commodore had achieved quite a literary reputation, and his name was familiar to American readers. He was the author of A Year in Spain, by a Young American, and Spain Revisited. He was also author of a popular life of Capt. Paul Jones, and some other works which were favorably received, besides being a valued contributor to the Knickerbocker and other periodicals of that day. The Somers went out in 1842 with a crew of 120 men and ninety-six apprentice boys under age, and on the return from the coast of Africa, while approaching the Isle of Pines, a mutiny was suspected, which demanded severe measures, as the officers believed, to secure the safety of the ship. After an investigation the young men above mentioned were hung to the yard-arm. It was believed that the conspirators intended to murder the officers and divert the vessel into a piratical cruiser. Commodore Mackenzie on reaching New York marched with his crew to the nearest church and returned thanks to Almighty God for their safe deliverance. He also sent on to Washington a sealed dispatch, conveying the first news of the tragedy that had been enacted. The intelligence, as spread through the country, caused a sensation, and what added to the interest was the fact that Spencer, the ringleader in the suspected mutiny, was a son of John C. Spencer, the then secretary of war under President Tyler's administration. As was natural, Secretary Spencer wrote a letter, which was extensively published, denouncing the act of Mackenzie as illegal and unnecessary, and saying if there were any grounds for believing that a mutiny was contemplated the prisoners, after their arrest and confinement in irons, should and could have been brought with safety to the United States. The commodore was tried by a court of inquiry, and also by a court martial, the trial lasting two months, and he was acquitted. Complaint was made during the trial because Benjamin F. Butler and Charles O'Connor, employing by the father of young Spencer, were not allowed to sit by and put questions approved by the court. Whatever may be thought of the character and necessity of the execution at this late day, the act of Mackenzie was complemented by the merchants of New York, and applauded by the press at the time, and the public voice generally was in his favor. Regarding the further history of Commodore Mackenzie, it may be stated that five years after the tragedy on the brig Somers, the Mexican war broke, out and toward its close Mackenzie was sent on a secret mission by President Polk (at the instance of the late Senator Slidell, a brother of Alexander Slidell Mackenzie, whose name was changed to meet some bequest to Santa Anna, then at Havana,) with a scheme to restore that ex-dictator to Mexico, upon some agreement advantageous to the United States, but the conference did not succeed. Mackenzie, a few years later, was killed by a fall from a horse, and the brig Somers went down to the bottom of the sea with all on board.

The Garfield Monument.

Washington Special: Sufficient funds to insure ability to pay for the proposed Garfield monument having been secured, the committee charged with selecting a design and an artist will meet shortly in Cincinnati. There has already been such communication among the members of the committee as to render it reasonably certain that Mr. J. G. Ward of Philadelphia will be secured for the work. He is the artist of the Thomas equestrian statue erected here by the Society of the Army of the Cumberland. This is regarded by the best judges as excelling any work of the kind in the city, and many whose opinions are accepted as authority declare it to be the best in the country. While the design of the Garfield monument has not yet been decided upon, the members of the committee are said to favor one which will represent him at the capitol. The scene of his inauguration will probably be the one chosen. The work will be of bronze, and the pedestal will, in case the design is decided upon, be a representation of the front porch of the capitol, and the position will be that assumed when he was delivering his inaugural address. The site will probably be Iowa circle, at the intersection of Vermont and Rhode Island avenues. This is one of the most eligible situations in the city, and is only one square distant from the Garfield Memorial church. The committee expect to perfect their arrangements so that the work may be commenced by the latter part of August or early in September. The committee is composed of Judge Advocate General Swaim, United States army; Gen. Barnett of Cleveland; Gen. Cist of Cincinnati; Col. Corbin, United States army; and several other members of the Society of the Army of the Cumberland.

HOME.

Oh! what is home? that sweet companionship
Of life the better part;
The happy smile of welcome on the lip,
Upspringing from the heart.

It is the eager clasp of kindly hands,
The long-remembered tone,
The ready sympathy which understands
All feeling by its own.

The rosy cheek of little children pressed
To ours in loving glee;
The presence of our dearest and our best,
No matter where we be.

And, failing this, a prince may homeless live
Though palace walls are nigh;
And, having it, a desert shore may give
The joy wealth cannot buy.

Far-reaching as the earth's remotest span,
Widespread as ocean foam,
One thought is sacred in the breast of man—
It is the thought of home.

That little word his human fate shall bind
With destinies above,
For there the home of his immortal soul
Is in God's wider love.

HINTS FOR THE HOUSEHOLD.

Hints to House Cleaners.

The warm weather of the past week has hurried the housewives into the hustle and bustle of house cleaning. Few go about it systematically. In fact everything is turned topsy-turvy, and, as a rule, by the time things are again straightened out another dose of cleansing and scrubbing would not be entirely unnecessary. Housewives, keep yourselves strong, and see that you do not begin to take up carpets, wash floors, and turn mattresses out of doors except on a bright, warm day. There are people ill with pneumonia at this writing, in spite of May in the almanac. Let it be settled, warm, before the larger operations begin. You can have pictures lifted from the walls, the glass rubbed off with whiting and the frames rubbed with linseed oil, and all stored away in a spare room out of the dust and away from the walls on some previous day. The walls do not get as much attention, otherwise, as they should. Take down all curtains, shades and lambrequins, and wipe and beat thoroughly, getting them previously out of the way. Then take up your carpets and clean your walls. Brush papered walls with a soft towel around the brush; scrub painted walls in clear water, no soap, but use a little ammonia where there are dust marks. Lime water is again recommended for use on all unpainted floors that are not hard finished, and treat your ceilings as you do your walls, brushing, washing or whitewashing, according to the finish. If you have had the forethought to provide an extra cover for your mattress of blue check this can come off and be washed at any time, as the mattress is kept free from dust. If not, let it go down to the yard and give it first a thorough dry brushing with a whisk, then go over it again with the whisk dampened, so as to cleanse it thoroughly. It must have a good sunning after this. Very few people wash their pillows, yet there is hardly any article of constant use that needs washing any more. They can be dropped into hot soap suds and stirred about, one at a time, so that the gathered dust will be washed out of them, then hang across the clothes line in a good breeze and sun, turning them frequently to have them dry evenly, and they had better remain before the kitchen fire all night to make sure of another day's sunning before they are used. This can be done before the general turn-out of cleaning house or at any time. Clean looking-glasses and windows with wet whiting, which gives a good polish, but give all dirty panes a good washing at first. Furniture is cleaned with turpentine, and then polished off with linseed oil. A painter's brush will get the turpentine into all carving, and if you wish to make one rubbing serve, a mixture of equal parts, say a gill of linseed oil, of vinegar and of turpentine, applied with a woolen cloth is recommended.

For the kitchen you can make a very pretty finish of the bricks around the range by dissolving some "potter's clay" and laying it on thickly; when it dries off to a soft dove-color it is one of the cleanest trimmings any one can have. If your floors have grease marks, this clay will generally remove them. If of long standing, get the floor planed off and have it oiled. A soapstone hearth and sink and wash-tubs are made fresh with marble-sand. For the brasses, use the old recipe of "rotten stone," using oxalic acid, diluted, are lemon juice for the obstinate spots.

Clean tins with a strong solution of boiling soda (washing soda), dipping them into this while you are rubbing them with the scouring sand. It is a little early to trim up open fire-places and grates so that they cannot be used, but any apothecary will tell you what to put into your lime bucket so as to give the pink or blue or green tinge you want. Put away heavy curtains and lace or muslin ones, and if you are buying new shades look at the pretty bamboo, so light and clean for summer. The new seamless mattings that come in dark colors, olive, red and blue, not check but plain, are also cool and "distinguished" fittings for floors, unless you prefer the easily kept boards themselves. The cellar is the part of the house which really should require least attention at this time of the year, because it should have been kept clean and free of rubbish. If it has not, you had best begin with that quarter before touching any other, for the reason that no up-stairs cleansing will make you clean until that is done.

An economical paint for floors is made by soaking two and one-eighth ounces of good, clear joiner's glue over a night in cold water. It is dissolved and then added (stirring constantly) to thickish milk of lime, heated to the boiling point and prepared from one pound of quicklime. Into the boiling lime is poured (the stirring still continued) as much linseed oil as becomes united with the lime, and when the oil no longer mixes there is no more poured in. If there happens to be too much oil added, it must be combined by the addition of some fresh lime paste. For the quantity above indicated, about half a pound of oil is required. After this white, thickish foundation paint has cooled, a color is added which is not affected by lime, and in case of need, the paint is diluted by water. For yellowish-brown or brownish-red shades about a fourth part of the entire bulk is added of a brown solution, obtained by boiling shellac and borax with water. This mixture is specially adapted for painting floors, where there is a rug in the center. For a floor which is in constant use, the most durable paint is that composed of linseed oil varnish, which penetrates into the wood and makes it water-resisting, its properties being thus of a nature to compensate for its higher cost.

To clean matting, put a pint of salt in a pail of warm water. Mop the matting well, one breadth at a time, and wipe with a cloth afterwards. To put away steel articles for the summer, or to leave knives, steel fenders of grates, etc., without rusting, grease the steel well with lard and tie up in brown paper. Carpets that are left down or put down again after shaking can be refreshed by sprinkling them well with corn meal mixed with coarse salt in equal quantity, and then sweeping it all off.

For yourself, feed well, tie your head up in a knitted Shetland or other shawl, and do not clean house in slippers. You will be sure to get into great "heats" and stand about in draughts, so protect the back of your neck where the tired feeling comes. Do not break yourself to pieces by lifting heavy furniture. If there are no men about the house to do it, have the nearest messenger boy in any shop in to help. Clean house with your head as well as your hands, and let your head save your feet whenever it is possible. But, above all, feed everybody well who is helping to clean house, instead of the usual tea and snatch-meals that most women think sufficient at such times. Canned soups come in very well and are cheap.

About Children.

An old and much-believed-in notion is this: A mother who is nursing her baby should not eat certain articles of food, no matter how much she may crave them, or how essential they may seem to be. Prominent among these discarded articles are various vegetables, such as cabbage, turnips, onions, and of fruits she must not eat plums, or anything tart. In place of these, or as a compensation for her loss, she may drink any quantity of tea. Sensible physicians and nurses are doing all that is possible to change this order. They say, and abundant evidence proves it true, that if from the first the mother eats in moderation the same food to which she has been accustomed, it will in the end be much better for her and for the child. The first time she eats vegetables the baby may cry, but it will not after that. Strength and flesh are often lost by the attempts at heroic self-denial many mothers have made. The woman to whom this is a new thought will be surprised to know that lemons even may be eaten with impunity, since the natural acids are so changed by the action of the gastric juice as to be rendered harmless.

It is a subject for thought, if one gives attention to it, to observe how we repeat old sayings, parrot-like, until they come true to us in our own experience. There are not many children who cannot say, with an air of wisdom (and, by the way, who looks so reverent and so wise as an infant of days?) "As the twig is bent the tree is inclined," but it has absolutely no meaning to them. I thought of this when considering how we help to form our children's habits, and it was as new as if it had never been spoken. To make a "practical illustration," do not when the baby wakes take him up at once; it is sometimes so convenient to have him lie contentedly down while awake, that however much you may wish to take him the moment he opens his eyes, do not always do so. Another point to note is expressed by George Eliot when she says, "It is not loud tones and mouthingness that make a woman's force;" no mother should govern her children by rude and angry threatenings; how can these fail to provoke the same spirit? "Your voice sounded so gentle, mamma, that I was ashamed not to mind," a child said to his mother in confidence after being rebuked for wrong doing.

Salted Meats.

We do not object to salted meats as an item in any bill of fare; they should, indeed, occupy an important place in the list of foods. But when, as often happens, particularly in remote and sparsely settled districts, all the animal food to be obtained is salted, it becomes mainly responsible for the great prevalence of scorbutic diseases in such districts. The evil effects that are liable to follow a long-continued use of salted meats may be modified to a great extent by the free use at the same time of fresh vegetables and acid fruits. The effect of an overuse of such fruits—as, for example, salted pork—seems to be to introduce an excess of salt into the system, thus changing the natural condition of the blood by an excess of one of its elements, and producing obstructions in the eliminating process; unsightly sores often appear, particularly on the face, which is kept dry and cool by exposure to the air, thus closing the pores of the skin by contraction of their orifices; the result being that the fluid, unable to pass out through the skin, becomes blocked up in the pores, causing inflammation at certain points; then ulceration follows in the form of pimples. These discharge, head up, and, if nothing is done to prevent it, are succeeded by other crops at various intervals. Salted foods are not so digestible as fresh foods, as a rule; but that is a difficulty easily remedied, under the rule of moderation. The stomach, like all other organs of the body, will adapt itself to all reasonable demands, and will, in fact, tolerate a good deal of harsh treatment for a long time, but sooner or later resents abuses. The best plan is to live on mixed diet of vegetable and animal foods, with frequent changes of variety. It is well to have a special bill of fare for each day in the week, to include fruits and other foods that are in season.

To Boil a Ham.

It is considered by some excellent authorities in cooking to be a great improvement on the ordinary manner of boiling ham if it is soaked in cold water over night. In the morning wipe it off; if there are any rusty or discolored spots scrape them off. The ham should be boiled very slowly; on this depends the sweetness and flakiness of the lean ham. Some whole cloves and a bouquet of herbs may be added to the boiling water with good effect. When the ham is done, set the kettle off the fire and let the ham remain in the water until it is cold. It will absorb a great deal of the juices that have boiled out. Then lay it in a large dripping pan, and spread a mixture, made after the following directions, over the ham: Take half a cupful of brown sugar, a teaspoonful of browned flour; moisten with a little sweet cream, or, if your conscience will allow it, with port wine. Then set the pan in the oven, and let the ham brown. When cold cut in very thin slices, and the flavor will be delicious.

Household Hints.

The top of fine elastic Balbriggan stockings can be utilized when the lower part is entirely worn out. The first knit wrappers for the baby can be made of them, after the pretty knit shirts of soft wool, tied with pink or blue ribbons, are laid aside. These are mostly the gifts of mamma's loving friends, and real life may be said to begin for the baby when he commences to wear cast-off clothing. The tops of two stockings will form the body of the wrapper, and there will be enough left for the little sleeves. Make very fine seams, so that they will lie down flat and not rub the tender flesh.

Whatever fashion may decree in regard to the manner and arrangement, flowers are never out of place on the table. The Southern fashion of putting large bouquets of roses alone on the dinner table may be followed in a few weeks by the North, and certainly nothing could be more delightful to the eye. Simpler and more natural combinations are the fancy of the hour in all kinds of table decoration.

It is a creditable state of mind which impels one to always buy the best, but the highest-priced things are not always so. For some kinds of cooking a moist brown sugar is preferable to the best white. In soft gingerbread this is especially true. Then for ginger snaps and cake and bread the old, dark molasses is preferred by all good cooks to the best New Orleans. It is impossible to make ginger snaps both crisp and yet tender without this.

The sensible as well as pleasing custom of serving fruit as a first course at breakfast should be practiced in every home as far as possible. One nice way to serve strawberries is to send the large fine ones to the table with the hulls on; put at each plate a little dish of some kind with sugar in, so that the berries may be dipped in it, and eaten daintily and most agreeably.

Economical and very useful bibs for teething children are made of honeycomb canvas. They may be bound with tape, or trimmed with a cheap but pretty cotton edging, which can be bought in packages containing five or more yards in a package.

Kitchen Keramics.

Although it is convenient to have the tea-kettle on the stove at all times, with a supply of boiling or hot water in it, still, unless cooking is going on, it is best not to let water continually boil down in the kettle. It is a fact that this harmless article of stove furniture may become a source of disease in consequence of the sediment which forms in the bottom and sides, and is dissolved to some extent and mixed with food. It is a common but erroneous notion that the tea-kettle never needs to be thoroughly cleansed. It should be washed as well as any other kettle or dish.

A pound-cake, with cocoanut in it, keeps well. Beat half a pound of butter and one pound of pulverized sugar to a creamy froth; stir in gradually one pound of sifted flour in which you have thoroughly mixed two teaspoonfuls of baking powder, a pinch of salt, and a teaspoonful of grated lemon-peel—this may be fresh or dried; four well-beaten eggs, a cupful of sweet milk, and a quarter of a pound of grated cocoanut; beat this in rapidly; bake in buttered tins in a moderate oven. This cake may be iced or not as you please.

French prunes make delicious pies. Soak them in a very little cold water all night; in the morning pinch the stones out of them, stew them slowly. When they are tender take them out of the water with a long-handled strainer. Then strain the water through a piece of flannel, add sugar and make a syrup to pour over the prunes. Bake with an upper and under crust.

The secret of success in making good pie crust is to mix the lard thoroughly with the flour before a drop of water is put with it; take both hands and mix until you could almost make crust of it and roll it out without water. A little lard goes a great way if properly rubbed with the flour, a tablespoonful to a cup of flour being a liberal allowance.

This will be a change from pudding or pie: Make a crust for strawberry shortcake; bake quickly, open it and put between the two layers halves or quarters of canned peaches, sprinkle powdered sugar over, and serve while hot with cream.

Stewed veal need not be the tasteless dish it often is. Cook it in as little water as will possibly answer, and with it stew a few thin slices of ham or bacon. Nicely-cured bacon is one of the luxuries of modern civilization.

Wafers to be used with jelly in place of tarts, are made of pie crust. They should be made with very cold water, and rolled as thin as possible. Cut them in squares.

Excellent pies are made of prunellos. Stew them slowly until perfectly soft. They are an imported dried fruit, very tart and pleasant to use at this season.

The Goodsells in Chicago.

"I see the Goodsells have taken out a charter for a Chicago Graphic," observed a chatty individual in Washington the other day, "and I have little doubt they will make the venture win. They had a hard pull of it in New York, but when they learned the ropes they made money like dirt, not only with their paper, but on 'the street,' as well. If they can work the Chicago board of trade as successfully as they have worked Wall street they will be able to retire in five years with money enough to live in boundless luxury for the remainder of their natural existence. The Goodsell boys know all about Chicago, having lived there for several years. One of the brothers was city editor of the Times when Wilbur F. Storey ran it on the red-hot system, with the pressure away up and the safety valve screwed down. The other brother was on the old Evening Post, and was a part owner, I believe. I do not know which of them will have charge of the Chicago institution."

HOW TO LIVE.

He liveth long who liveth well!
All other life is short and vain;
He liveth longest who can tell
Of living most for heavenly gain.

He liveth long who liveth well!
All else is being flung away;
He liveth longest who can tell
Of true things truly done each day.

Waste not thy being; back to him
Who freely gave it, freely give;
Else is that being but a dream;
'Tis but to be, and not to live.

Be what thou seemest! live thy creed!
Hold up to earth the torch divine;
Be what thou prayest to be made,
Let the great master's steps be thine.

Fill up each hour with what will last;
Buy up the moments as they go;
The life above, when this is past,
Is the ripe food of life below.

Sow truth, if thou the truth wouldst reap;
Who sows the false shall reap the vain;
Erect and sound thy conscience keep;
From hollow words and deeds refrain.

Sow love, and taste its fruitage pure;
Sow peace, and reap its harvest bright;
Sow sunbeams on the rock and moor,
And reap a harvest home of light.

CHURCHES AND CLERGYMEN.

Yankeeism in the Church.

The Rev. Charles Cuthbert Hall, of the Henry Street Presbyterian church, Brooklyn, writes to the Christian Union of "Yankeeism" in the church: "When the strains of Thomas' orchestra had died away in one church, to be succeeded by Shakspearean readings; and when in another church, after a glee club had rejoiced the audience, and portions of Julius Cæsar had been recited, the pastor arose, in the place where he ordinarily preaches the gospel of Christ and administers the sacraments, and delivered a ludicrous and inimitably funny address on Shall He Wear a Silk Hat? when—we remark—these exercises were concluded, it did seem a not unfitting time to ask thinking Christian people: Is the church a social club or a divine foundation? In the name of God, whom we serve, which is it? Or is it both? Or, if neither, what is it? The idea of the church, as Christ gave us that idea, is fading out here. Children are finding out that the place can be demeaned for all sorts of uses without rebuke from any quarter. Young people's associations are growing bolder in their claim upon the church buildings in the interests of a jollity that passes for religious activity. The modern 'communion of saints' is freely believed to involve salad and ices; that your church will not be 'successful' unless you 'get the people together for social intercourse.' 'Everybody must be made to feel at home,' which practically means that before or after divine service everybody must chat with and nod to his neighbor, and gayly discuss current topics, in order to dispel the feeling of 'stiffness.' The Christly ideal of the church is fading out, and is being supplanted by the principles of action suitable in a social club. And this fading out of the Christly ideal has been accelerated by several influences which we can only mention as secondary to our main point. Among these we may mention the practice of church sociables, conducted by an organized entertainment committee; the practice of arranging fairs, dramatic, literary, or musical exhibitions, for the filling of empty treasuries and the bolstering up of sickly enterprises; the yet grosser practice of 'letting out' the church as a concert and lecture hall, or for such unmentionable degradation as may be included under the name of 'wax-works,' enticing the public to pay debts the people ought to pay or not contract. The disease fastened on our American church life is Yankeeism—the idea that you must be 'chatty;' and if everybody is 'chatty,' and the church life buzzes along with little sociables, and parties, and suppers, and entertainments, and everybody has a jolly time, that church is all right—plenty of life in that church. That isn't one of your 'proud, stuck-up churches' (I here use the actual words of others), 'where you go in and out for a month, and nobody speaks to you, and there is nothing but the service going on.' What is the cause of this Yankeeism? People are looking at each other, and not at Christ, and they want the spice of worldly life introduced in the church. If we looked at him and worshiped him, the church would satisfy us, the worship would satisfy us, and we would deplore as an intrusion any petty social amusement introduced in connection with our church life. We would say: 'Defile not my church life with the footprints of the world. Let there be one place where the world is not suggested. Let me have one Holy of Holies left in my life; a place where I can commune with my Saviour and lose all thought of smaller matters in the infinite greatness of Calvary and the heavenly Jerusalem!'"

About Quartet Choirs.

Plymouth church has abandoned the paid quartet choir plan, and has organized a choir whose duty it shall be to lead and not entertain the congregation. Mr. Beecher, in addressing the new choir, which is composed of over fifty voices, at its first general practice, said:

"I do not regard singing as a mere musical utterance. I regard singing as the wings of instruction. There are two means by which a congregation is lifted upward in devotion—by prayer lyrical and by prayer didactic. For one the congregation depends on me, and for the other on the choir in the form of music. You are as much a minister as I am, and in some respects you are more so. I pray once at a service—you sing two or three times; and all the day five or six times. Almost all the hymns are direct addresses to the throne of God. There must be nothing improper or shocking in me; neither must there be in you. Suppose I began a prayer: 'O Lord!' and then began twisting and pulling something out of my pocket and nudging some one near me. Why, the congregation would become so shocked that they would never come to hear me again. See how irreverent and shocking such conduct in a choir is, unless the music is to be only a noise to cover up something in the church—the shutting up of seats, or the getting of hats, or the whisper 'I'll meet you at such a place.' Singing ought to be the most devout and religious element in worship. The choir is set conspicuously in the congregation, and the eyes of all are constantly seeing you. All I ask is that those who sit in the choir behave with the same decorum as though they sat in the congregation. I don't mean as stiff as wax candles, but with seeming propriety and solemnity. What is not proper in me is not to be permitted in the choir. I hope that, singing together, you will be knit together, and that this religion will become finally the joy of your life and your comfort in sickness and death."

Heber Newton's Heresy.

The Churchman: "Three presbyters of the diocese of New York, of excellent repute, have made a presentment of one of their brethren before their bishop for trial on the charge of breaking his ordination vows and teachings heresy. They have also, by one of their number, extra-canonically, to say the least and the best of it, gone beyond the presentment to the bishop, and made one also to the world through the columns of the daily journals. In the statement made to the public by Mr. Newton's presenters, they justify their action by saying that 'to pass by such an offense * * * would be to encourage in our ministry the most dangerous forms of unbelief.' We venture to assert that the church does not attempt to check unbelief by canon, nor does she attempt to coerce belief by canon, nor do the clergy shape their belief according to canon. With reference to the sermons by the Rev. Mr. Newton, it is to be said that it was in the power, and, more than that, it was the duty, of the bishop to cause an investigation preparatory to presentment to be made by five persons, three of whom should be presbyters, if he had reason to believe that 'the interest of the church required an investigation.' It is not known that the bishop took any such step, and therefore it is to be inferred that he did not believe a presentment to be required by the interest of the church."

Freeman's Journal: "If Mr. Newton be tried, we may expect a general persecution. The hand of every devout Protestant Episcopalian will be against the hand of every other devout Protestant Episcopalian, until the fittest will survive and be a little church unto himself. When he—this last man—finds himself bewildered between a Bible full of the errors of King James and another full of the errors of the revisers, he can try himself, and legislate himself out of his private judgment in a dignified manner."

The Danger of Ritualism.

A writer in The Watchman believes that ritualism is the coming danger in the religious world. He says: "I had lately the pleasure of listening to the Rev. Dr. Cuthbertson, of the Free church, London. He had words of cheer that will be welcome to every Christian heart. But, though the day of doubt is on the wane in England, he thinks that there and here there is a grave danger threatening—that of ritualism. In Oxford and Cambridge, he says, addresses on the 'highest' churchism are listened to with enthusiasm and even cheers. 'Broad Church' views win respectful attention, but waning applause, while evangelical views and presentations are groaned and hissed, even 'howled' down! 'And,' said the eloquent speaker, 'the trial is coming to you in America; 'tis on the great wave rolling across the sea. Do not make the mistake that we in England made, of giving toleration to what is, in all but having the pope, Papacy. Do not give up the freedom for which your heroic fathers fought and died. Take the evil by the throat and strangle it in the beginning.'"

A Mexican Mission.

The Church of Jesus, a missionary enterprise started in Mexico a few years ago by the Protestant Episcopal church, does not appear to be in a very flourishing condition. Bishop Riley was put at its head, and though no allegations are made against his personal integrity and ability, it is loudly asserted by many that he is tyrannical and that the movement has been a fiasco from the beginning. The Rev. J. Milton Green, a missionary in Mexico, has written a letter to the Christian at Work in which he makes serious charges of mismanagement and sectarian bigotry against some of the missionaries of the Church of Jesus. In view of all this, it is promised that the foreign missionary committee of the Protestant Episcopal church will look into the facts, "and at the proper time will give the explanation to those who have a right to expect it." The Independent thus describes the existing condition of the Mexican Church of Jesus: "The present state of the church appears to be one of division. It is divided into so many dioceses that it is a question whether the canonical clergy will not be almost all employed in furnishing the episcopate. It is divided into several bodies, which have dropped the work of reformation to fight each other. The schools are divided, and part of the scholars are under the care of another church. The theological seminary has closed until further orders. As to the congregations nobody can tell anything about them until the storm blows over and the fragments are picked up. There is one consolation for the Riley party; it has still in its employ as many as its financial resources can provide for. The name of the church is still long enough for division; and, doubtless, there is left territory which can be sliced into dioceses. We recall that Bishop Riley has a genius for organization. A few years ago he organized and equipped a Reformed church or two in Spain and Portugal."

Sunday School Lessons.

Sunday School Times: That there is a shaping power over a generation in the system of International Sunday School Lessons, is obvious; its enemies themselves being judges. Every now and then the Springfield Republican has some sneer at the plan and method of these lessons; yet that journal affirms that "the church, by the vast and powerful machinery of the 'international lessons,' is drilling its millions of children in absolute respect for the divine authority of every page from Genesis to Revelation." And there is a good measure of truth in this affirmation; more truth than there is in the same journal's suggestion that "a feeling of doubt and unreality as to very much of this ['Biblical and supernatural theology'] is permeating the men who listen and the men who teach as well." The International Lesson-system has quickened thorough and intelligent Bible study in the whole English-speaking world; it has created a literature of its own, and it has far more largely shaped the publishing and reading interests of England and America than any other agency within the period of its working. As a result, there was never so much of an abiding rest on the inspiration and the divine authority of the scriptures as at the present time, in New England or out of it. And there was never a day when the writings and addresses of sceptics had as little influence, actual or comparative influence, on either side of the ocean, as since the adoption of the International Lesson system.

A Salvation Army Announcement.

The War Cry, the organ of the English Salvation Army, recently contained the following startling announcement in large display headlines: "Frozen to death last Sunday, owing to the extreme cold prevailing all around him (no professed worshiper of God having even given him a warm shake of the hand or a sparkling look), Jack Godless died in his sins without the least hope, and his soul perished. As he did not feel like going to any place of worship, and as nobody seemed particularly to want him to go, he stayed out in the fog, where so many millions remain, unable to see whether there is anything in religion. He might have been saved if anybody had been willing to take the trouble to go out to him, but those whose duty it was to do so thought it was quite unreasonable to expect them to turn out such a day! His dead body, having been duly laid out, and the fact of his death having been generally made known, an inquest was held without the assistance of the coroner, at the headquarters of the Salvation army, 101 Queen Victoria street, E. C., where the following verdict was directed to be entered in the War Cry: 'The soul of the deceased was lost owing to exposure to temptation without any friendly help to salvation, and there can be no doubt that somebody was guilty of gross negligence!'"

Pious Paragraphs.

At the annual meeting of the Salvation army in London, Gen. Booth stated that the army had now 491 corps, with an income derived from them of £121,000. The rental of barracks entailed an expenditure of £21,000 a year, and the army had property of its own now worth £150,000, upon which there was a debt of £54,000. About £10,000 was contributed during the day. Among those who took part in the meeting was a Yorkshire woman, eighty-four years old, who said she had been in prison 280 times for drunkenness.

The Christian at Work says: There was a small collection of Methodists in Pennsylvania so sensitive in their perfection that in using the Lord's prayer they omitted the clause "forgive us our trespasses," because it implied a confession of faults. But when the leader of the society left his wife and ran away with a young woman who had been very prominent in refusing to repeat the prayer except in the altered form, the clique speedily broke up.

President Eliot, of Harvard, thinks it would be a great improvement in the relation between minister and congregation "if the minister were frankly allowed sometimes to comment upon a fresh book instead of preaching a sermon, sometimes to read other men's sermons instead of his own, and in general to direct his hearers to good reading, and bring them to know something of the minds and works of the leaders of the race, living and dead."

At an evening prayer-meeting in a neighboring town, as the 9 o'clock bell ceased ringing, the clergyman who presided arose and spoke in a most solemn and impressive manner of the reminder they had just received from the bells of the flight of time and the necessity of spending time well while it is ours to improve. When he sat down an elderly female arose, and in a shrill voice startled the assembly by remarking in a contradictory tone: "I think it must be fire."

While the Methodist ministers are waiting for the Bulgarian authorities to rescind their orders closing the Methodist schools, the Bulgarian press is freely discussing the question of the rights of Protestants which is of international concern. It is said that there are not more than 300 Protestants in Bulgaria.

In heaven, we are told, there is more joy over one sinner that repenteth than every ninety-and-nine who have never gone astray. It is just the other way here below. There is more joy over one righteous man that goes astray than over ninety-and-nine thousand sinners who have kept at it all their lives.

An old colored preacher in Atlanta, Ga., was lecturing a youth of his fold about the sin of dancing, when the latter protested that the Bible plainly said: "There is a time to dance." "Yes, dar am a time to dance," said the dark divine, "and it's when a boy gits a whippin' for going to a ball."

I went to a Baptist church last Sunday out of curiosity. They passed a basket for collections. I put in 10 cents. The man next to me had the nerve to open his coat and show his shield. He was a police officer in citizen's clothes. He'll get the chromo, never fear.

Isaac's Sad Death.

Do you know that the Israelites are the best story tellers in the world, and that they never tire of relating any that bear on the peculiarities or weaknesses of the chosen people? Here is another good one I got on the Rialto. Two friends meet on Broadway. One has a heavy weed on his hat. "Hello, Moses," says his friend, "what ish der matter by dot crape on yer hat?"

"For my brudder Isaac. Don't you know?"

"No. I vas out on town. Ish he dead?"

"Yaas."

"Vot vas der matter on him?"

"Vell, you know he vos er very pious man. Las' Saturday he vent to der synagogue, and just in the middle of der prayers a feller on der sidewalk calls out, 'Job lots, job lots!' Vell, in der crush an' confusion my brudder was suffocated."

CROOKSTON, MINNESOTA.

The decision of the United States circuit court in Iowa, that the drive-well patents are invalid is received with much joy by farmers. It will probably be appealed to the supreme court, but the result will undoubtedly be the same as in the circuit court. Of course nobody will pay during the pending of the suit.

Among the most notable benefactions of the late Amasa Stone, of Cleveland, during his life, were the donation of $40,000 to the Cleveland Industrial School, $40,000 to the Cleveland Home for Aged and Indigent Women, and $500,000 for the endowment of Adelbert College, at that city. The latter institution is named in honor of his only son, Adelbert B Stone, who was accidentally drowned some years ago while he was a student at Yale College.

The War Department has sent orders to the fifteen army-recruiting stations to secure as many recruits as possible, with proper regard for the qualification of the applicants. This is not due to the fact, as has been reported, that there is an unusual number of desertions, but to the fact that many terms of enlistment now expire. The demand for recruits, however, will not cause any lowering of the standard. Nearly all the recruiting stations of the war department are now open, which is not customary at this season of the year.

Lucy Stone writes to the Springfield Republican that "it brings warmth to the heart to find that Sir John Macdonald's proposed franchise bill in Canada includes unmarried women and widows for the full franchise and on the same terms as men," and that "he will enjoy the honor of having taken the lead in securing political rights for women." It is pleasant to know that anything brings warmth to Lucy's heart, but a cold chill is probably in store for her, as the bill is likely to be defeated.

Saturday, November 10, will be the 400th anniversary of the birth of Martin Luther, the great German reformer, and preparations have already begun in Germany and this country for an appropriate celebration of the event. The Martin Luther Society for New York proposes a statue at Washington, an exact counterpart of one of the finest monuments in Europe erected at Wurms, commemorative of Luther's appearance before the Imperial Diet, at the age of thirty-seven, and $5,000 of the money has already been raised by the New York Society.

Texas is an empire in itself, and when divided according to law, will make four states each larger than the largest in the Union. Here are some facts relating to Texas that are of interest to all. There are in Texas 6,200 miles of railway lines, growing two miles daily. Tax is 30 cents on each $1,000. There are $4,250,000 in the state treasury. State bonds are worth 40 per cent. premium, and the debt of the state was reduced by that rare old genius, Governor Roberts, who doesn't believe in political thanksgiving days, $1,400,000 last year, leaving a balance of Texas bonds outstanding, and held mainly by Texas schools and institutions of learning, of $1,000,000 5 per cents. The state's taxable wealth has grown from $280,000,000 in 1877 to $410,000,000 in 1882. The Free School Fund will soon be $6,361,000. More than a million dollars were dispensed last year among free schools attended by 295,000 pupils. A white and normal colored school provide home-made teachers. The university of Texas has 1,000,000 acres of choice land, and there is engrafted in the constitution of Texas a provision enabling a poor man to invest $5,000 in real estate and making it his homestead. It cannot be mortgaged or sold for debt, and only conveyed absolutely by the joint deed of man and wife.

The drive-well decision by the United States court in Iowa causes great satisfaction in the northwest. Col. Nelson W. Green holds a patent for a drive well issued in 1868, and his agents have forced contributions from many farmers and others who have used the process in sinking wells, and commenced many suits against others who refused to be bled. The United States circuit court now declares this patent void. The language of a portion of the decision is as follows:

"The court holds that there are two well-established instances of prior use of the principle involved in this patent, one of them being in Independence, Iowa, where a well was sunk in the early summer of 1861, and the other at Milwaukee, where a large number of them were put down as early as 1849, the patent to Green not having been issued till 1868, and the application of the principle not having been discovered and put into use by him until after the well at Independence was proved a success. The court holds that Col. Green made no effort to prevent the use of his discovery by the public for about seven years, and it is upon this showing more than the fact that the Iowa and Wisconsin wells antedated Col. Green's discovery and application of the principle, that the patent is held void. The court also held that the issue was void for the reason that it set out a broader claim than was contained in the original patent." Some of those who have been bled by the agents of Green are now talking of measures for getting their money back.

Gen. Badeau to be Counted Out.

Washington Special: Judge Ferris, second auditor of the treasury, has made a decision of general interest to army officers, and particularly to those who are on the retired list. The decision is that Gen. Adam Badeau is not in the army, and is improperly borne on its rolls. The case came up upon an application for longevity pay under the Taylor decision. His case had been further presented to the department through a recent attempt of his to draw the pay of his rank on the retired list at the same time that he is drawing his salary as consul general at Havana. The decision is based upon the operation of an act of congress by which those officers on the retired list who accept a civil office should be deemed by that act to have resigned their commissions. The decision will, if sustained, affect the status of several officers now on the retired list, and will establish a new ruling of much importance to the army.

NEWS OF THE STATE.

HOMEOPATHY.

The Minnesota State Homeopathic institute commenced upon the work of its seventeenth annual meeting in the senate chamber at the state capitol on Tuesday, and the session ended on Wednesday afternoon.

The president, Dr. George H. Hawes of Hastings, presided. The meeting was opened with prayer by the Rev. R. F. MacLaren of St. Paul. The names of the following applicants for membership were then received and referred to the board of censors: A. C. Dockstader, Granite Falls; William L. Cradock, St. Paul; G. W. Arbuckle, Breckinridge; A. T. Sherman, Anoka, D. W. Graham, Minneapolis.

The report of the treasurer was received and ordered placed on file; Receipts, $176.79; expenditures, $320; amount due treasurer, $143.21.

Most of the day was devoted to the reading of papers and discussing thereon. Upon the report of the board of censors the following named physicians were admitted to membership. W. L. Cradock. Routh, of St. Paul, registered.

On Wednesday President Hawes delivered his annual address.

As on the previous day, the time was mostly spent in reading dissertations and in discussions, purely of a professional character and not of general interest to the public at large.

Dr. A. C. Cowperthwait of Iowa City was elected an honorary member of the institute. In returning his thanks to the institute Dr. Cowperthwait remarked that he knew of no organization that promised more for the country than this homeopathic institute of St. Paul. There was an abundance of young blood in it, and the old blood was full of energy. Dr. D. W. Graham of Minneapolis was chosen to membership.

The officers and committees for the ensuing year, were elected as follows:

President—H. Hutchinson, St. Paul.

First vice president—J. A. Steele, Minneapolis.

Second vice president—P. G. Denninger, Faribault.

Arrest of Land Thieves.

Taylor's Falls (Minn.), Special.—Considerable excitement was created here Friday over the arrest for land frauds of Albert Campbell, Charles Cura, John H. Rowe, C. Dubey, Ormond C. Bragg, John Clement, Clarence Lambern, Andrew Runyan, Thomas Nonnan and M. Dayan. The arrest was made on the cars by Maj. A. B. Brackett deputy United States Marshal, and his assistants. Claims had been filed in the name of the prisoners on pine lands in Mille Lacs county. They attempted to prove up at the land office here yesterday, but were confronted by Ex-Gov. Marshall, special agent of the land department, who had made a thorough inspection of the lands, and found no one living on them, nor any habitable improvements. The proofs of the claimants were rejected by the land officers and the men arrested. They were taken to St. Paul for examination before Court Commissioner Spencer. The latter gentleman, also Assistant United States District Attorney C. A. Congdon, was present here when the arrests were made. The names of John Martin & Co. of Minneapolis are unpleasantly connected with the affair. Mr. Brown of this firm was with the men. The government is understood to have evidence that implicates other parties than those arrested. The action of the land officers at this place is commendable, that in this first effort of men unlawfully to appropriate the public lands in this district, they have failed and are likely to be brought to justice.

No Fair at Minneapolis This Year.

The following note from Col. W. S. King will interest readers in every portion of the state:

MINNEAPOLIS, May 17. In answer to very many inquiries from all parts of the country, permit me to say through your columns that the managers of the Minnesota Agricultural and Mechanical association have decided not to hold any fair this year. It was hoped and expected that measures for union fair grounds and fairs between St. Paul and Minneapolis would have been completed in time for a fair on such new grounds this coming fall, but in this the parties interested have been disappointed.

Sebastian Klett, one of the first settlers of Fountain City, died on Tuesday of dropsical ailment at the age of seventy-four years. Thirty years ago Mr. Klett and his wife came to the West directly from Germany, and settled on the farm in Eagle valley, about two miles from Fountain City, where they have ever since resided.

St. Paul has just organized its first La Crosse club with the following officers: President Dr. MacDonald; vice president Thomas McCan; Secretary, G. W. Purdy, Jr.; treasurer, F. Conaughton; field captain, A. A. Dennie.

The body of an adult female was found in the river at the upper end of Shakopee by a little boy who was fishing. The body however was minus the head and right foot, which (as the examining physician stated), were neatly sawed off. The general opinion is that it is the body of Mrs. Julia Unze who died recently some time last winter and whose body was mysteriously stolen from the grave. Her brother, William Henke, although offering a reward of $350, has been unable to recover the body. An inquest was held and the jury found that the person, whose body lay before them, had come to her death by "having her head and right foot cut off by persons to them unknown."

United States Marshall Denny is in possession of several confidential circulars issued and sent out by different parties in the East, offering to furnish victims with counterfeit money in denominations of ones, twos, fives and tens. The latest is signed by Henry Otto, 819 East Ninth steet. New York city. The authorities are on the track of all these gentry and several have already come to grief.

Robert Craig, a freight conductor running No. 13 between Tracy and Sleepy Eye, was recently killed. He attempted to pass from his caboose to the engine while the train was moving between Tracy and Walnut Grove, and fell between the cars, which passed over his head, arms and legs, crushing him in a horrible manner. His death was instantaneous. This was his first trip as conductor on this end of the road.

ARMY OF THE POTOMAC.

Annual Reunion in Washington—Gen. Newton Elected President—Review by President Arthur—Address by Major Maginnis.

The reunion of the army of the Potomac at Washington on the 16th, in connection with the public parade and other exercises was a very brilliant affair. It was the first representative gathering of the army of the Potomac in Washington since the war; and, as the soldiers of twenty years ago marched past the stand, many of them gray-bearded and bowed with the weight of the intervening years, it recalled the review of 1865 when the army of the Potomac marched up the avenue and passed in review before the president 100,000 strong. Of the society of the army of the Potomac there were about 1,600 men in line, and together with the various organizations composing the escort, about 3,500 men were in line. The president was surrounded by a number of prominent men. Gen. Sherman and Vice Admiral Rowan were the only officers in uniform. The president saluted the different sections by raising his hat. The fife and drum corps played Marching Through Georgia. To this Gen. Sherman responded by raising his hat, but he involuntarily kept time with his foot.

At the business meeting in the afternoon a sharp contest was aroused over the election of president of the society. Gen. Grant was proposed, but the large majority of those present being from Pennsylvania and New York, he was defeated by Gen. Newton, of Hell Gate. When Grant's name was brought forward, cheers and cries of "Grant!" "Grant!" "Vote!" "Newton!" for some minutes made it impossible for any one of the score of gentleman who were on their feet to be heard. Then followed a running discussion as to Gen. Grant's eligibility. Some one from the stage declared he was an honorary member. A voice from the audience replied, "He hasn't paid his dues." Another called out, "For fourteen years he declined to become a member of our society. Why burden him with this honor now?" Finally Gen. Humphreys gained attention, and naively suggested:

If I remember rightly Gen. Grant, at one time was intimately associated with the army of the Potomac near the close of war. I think is clearly eligible if you choose to elect him.

This was received with shouts of laughter and applause from all quarters, and it was moved to proceed to ballot the result being as follows: Gen. Newton, 155; Gen. Grant, 117, scattering, 7. Gen. Newton's election was made unanimous, and with the exception of president the old officers were re-elected. Brooklyn, N. Y., was selected as the place of the next reunion of the society.

In the evening there was a brilliant audience at the National theatre.

The veterans filled the first floor and a number of distinguished generals, among whom were Gens. Sherman, Rosecrans, Beaver, Hazen, Webb and Slocum, occupied seats on the stage. Judge Edmunds welcomed the society to Washington, and George Alfred Townsend read a poem. It was an artistic effort, devoted chiefly to the memory of Lincoln.

The oration by Maj. Martin Maginnis of the First Minnesota was the chief feature of the evening. He was over an hour in delivering it, but was listened to throughout with close attention and evident interest. The appreciation of the audience was frequently exhibited by hearty and long continued applause. At one time when he alluded in a particularly effective way to Gen. Sherman as the "magnificent Sherman," the old veterans arose in their seats, threw up their hats and fairly shouted in their enthusiasm. He inspired many other similar outbursts and was enthusiastically cheered and personally and heartily congratulated by many at the close.

MAGINNISS' ADDRESS.

Addressing the president of the United States and his comrades of the army of the Potomac, Mr. Maginnis said:

Surely comrades, as you again came down to the Potomac, and to your eye again appeared the white vision of the capitol, around which, phantom-like have clustered memories that have attended you through a long peace amid the struggles of existence, in the fields of everyday endeavor, surely the stones of twenty years were rolled away; and out of the sepulchre of each comrade's past came forth a young, an ardent, an heroic spirit. Planted by the fathers in the center of their United States, revolution had moved the capital to the frontier. Worse! Secession was behind as well as in front of it. It was an outpost in the enemy's country—garrisoned only by the government. Secession had gone back to the sacred soil but it said, with Catline, I go! but I return. For offense or defense Washington was strategically weak, but its foundation were laid with those of the Union. It was hallowed by association with the venerated dead. It was the sacred city of the nation. And the loyal people determined that never should domestic insurrection profane its holy places. There is no need to defend the justice of that war which has given us a Union. The military history of our campaigns is a road beset with thorns, involving criticisms on generals who are members of this society, and on statesmen who had large followings in their lives and are honored by the country in their deaths. Let critics and historians perform this ungrateful task. I shall give only honor to our superiors in the cabinet and in the field. It is boasted that the best blood of the South was in their ranks. Well, the best blood and brains of the North were in ours. The orators of our pulpits, the lights of the bar, senators and representatives were privates in the army of the Potomac. The story of that army is a sad but glorious story of bootless efforts, useless sacrifices and final success. Worn out in marches without objects; wasted in battles that had no results; tainted with inactivity; baffled by interference and delay, it struggled, fought and bled for victory. For as this was the people's war, it turned out to be the people's fight. No Alexander, Cæsar or Napoleon arose to monopolize its glories and claim its victories for himself alone. As far as the army of the Potomac was concerned, there never was an army that owed less to brilliancy of leadership or the inspiration of genius. What it lost was often from the lackes of its direction; what it won it dearly paid for in its own patriotic blood. In the history of the war this army is entitled to the right of the line. Through all the baffles and smiles of folly, for one and glory, when hope was lost in useless endeavor, and patriotism paled in the apathy of outworn enthusiasm, its discipline, its spirit, its organization never failed and whatever criticism may be made as to how it was fought, this society of this country unite in praising the organizing hand of our comrade and chief, McClellan. More so than with our other armies that discipline was needed to fit it for its task. It could maintain no bummers. It never camped out of the sound of the enemy's guns or bivouaced beyond the reach of immediate attack; a gladiator always in the arena, a knight whose guard could never be let down. That discipline was superb. If in the wider sense discipline means that obedience to duty, which keeps men in line when they fight, and in column when they march, to fight again to-morrow, and march the night after, until energy is exhausted and obedience mechanical; if that be discipline, as it is the object of discipline, then it was the best disciplined army on this planet. But, comrades, the result is worth it all. Every passing year will make more plain the decree of the god of battles that the lost cause was justly lost. To this city, where they had met, the comrades of many years were called, that they might part. You crossed the Potomac, and turning your backs upon its banks, marched in review up the avenue, that river of steel, wave after wave passed the White house and moved by the capitol to break and part and return to the uttermost parts of the Union. But of all those whose tattered standards floated on the air and whose triumphant music filled the heart with joy, how few there were of the faces that four years before had marched down that avenue the other way—had marched down to the battle field, the hospital, the grave. How much vaster the shadowy hosts of the dead, whose pale memories moved with the column and kept time to the march. From scores of fields, consecrated by their deaths, forever sacred to their memories, they could not come unless it shall be to meet us under the walls of a city more desired than Richmond, more resplendant than Washington, in the last reunion of the army of the Potomac.

Then followed a series of speeches beginning with Gen. Sherman, who was greeted with great enthusiasm. Speeches were also made by Gens. Slocum, Webb, Beaver, Keifer and others.

GREETING TO MINNESOTA.

The following sent by those of the First Minnesota who are participating in the reunion explains itself.

To the comrades of the old First Minnesota: The army of the Potomac is again in action, and the First Minnesota, as usual to the front, led by one of our most distinguished members, Maj. Martin Maginnis, orator of the day. John G. Merritt, company K; David A. Cafflin, company A; O. D. Thatcher, company E; J. M. Churchill, company I; George Durfee, company D.

LIEUT. COL. GUIDO ILGES.

A Sketch of the Unpleasant Causes of His Resignation and of His Brilliant Military Career.

Washington special: The resignation of Col. Guido Ilges, Eighteenth infantry, has been received at the department. As his unconditional resignation was called for by the secretary of war, it will no doubt be accepted by the president at once. Information received at the war department corroborates the statement already made in the Pioneer Press regarding the reason for Col. Ilges' peremptory resignation. It is to the effect that he hypothecated at least eight pay accounts for periods for which he has since drawn his pay in person, amounting to over $500. Besides this he borrowed considerable amounts of money while here last year, which he gave notes for, and has made no efforts to repay, although repeatedly urged to do so. He recently tendered his resignation, to take effect Jan. 1 next, and asked that leave be granted him until that date. Secretary Lincoln however, telegraphed Col. Ilges to the effect that if he tendered his resignation to take effect at once, it would be accepted, otherwise he would be tried by court martial for conduct unbecoming an officer and a gentleman, in duplicating his pay accounts as above stated.

Col. Ilges is a native of Prussia, an ex-officer of the Prussian army and coming into this country, was appointed a captain in the Fourteenth Infantry, May 14, 1861, accepting his commission the next month. During the rebellion he served with great gallantry, commanding the Fourteenth during most of 1864, and was breveted major for gallantry at the battle of the Wilderness, and lieutenant colonel for the battle of Spottsylvania, in 1864. Since the war he was almost continuously on the frontier, and in 1880, when he exchanged from the Seventh to the Fifth infantry with Major Brotherton, he distinguished himself by rounding up and bringing in Sitting Bull and his band of Sioux warriors. Once before Col. Ilges has been in a similar trouble. In 1873, while captain of the Fourteenth infantry, he duplicated his accounts, was tried by general court martial, and sentenced to be cashiered, but Gen. Grant, who was then president, mitigated the sentence in consideration of his brilliant war history, and as he was then the senior captain of infantry this action enabled him to be promoted Dec. 10, 1873, to major of the Seventh infantry, from which he exchanged to the Fifth, as stated. While he was commanding in Missouri in 1879-80 Lieut. Gen. Sheridan had such confidence in his ability and judgment as a soldier, as well as an executive officer, that he advised Gen. Terry not to send anybody who will outrank Ilges. Gen. Terry did not, and Ilges rounded up Sitting Bull and his band of renegades. Col. Ilges is one of the finest looking officers in the army. He is over six feet in height, broad shoulders, and in uniform and mounted is the very beau ideal of a soldier. The cause of his downfall is more than likely his inability to believe that two pair will not beat three of a kind. Fort Assinniboine, where Col. Ilges was stationed, is the largest and most northerly military post in the country, comprising eight troops of cavalry and four of infantry.

Hope Deferred.

Washington, special:—The whole bottom is believed to have been knocked out of the colored convention. The meeting held here to denounce the committee issuing the call was composed of colored men who represent several states, while those who are moving in the interest of the proposed gathering are mostly residents of the district, possessed of no vote, or men of no influence outside of the circles of their own intimate acquaintance.

Claim Grabbing and Shooting

Grafton Special to Grand Forks Herald: A young German named Louis Secha, who lives in township 155, range 57, came in recently for a warrant for the arrest of P. J. Breen. Justice Yorkey issued the document and sent Constable Catherwood. Secha says Breen is holding several claims, and fighting people off. Secha found a claim vacant. After he went to bed one night he was startled by two shots which passed through the walls over his head. He jumped up and went to the window, when another shot crashed through the glass. He saw Breen, and fired at him with a revolver without effect.

The Greeley Arctic Relief Party.

Gen. Hazen, in an interview respecting the arrangements for the Greeley relief party, said: The relief party will leave St. John's promptly on July 1. Everything that the most careful study and close attention could devise has been attended to and will be availed of. The Proteus has been chartered, subject only to the inspection of her boilers by a naval engineer, and it is certain that the best ship will go, probably attended by an escort to bring back tidings in case of any unforseen accident or detention. The party has been selected with the utmost care by Gen. Terry, and the officer in charge and all his men are said to be energetic, capable and sober. To Lieut. Garlington's party will be added in St. John's Capt. Norman and two Arctic fishermen, and further on a few Esquimaux. I have no fears of perfect success.

A Destructive Hoosier Cyclone

Richmond, Ind., Special,—The reports of the tornado that passed south of this city have not been exaggerated. The town of Waterloo, in Fayette county, suffered more, perhaps, than any other locality. It consisted of nineteen new houses and a complement of barns, stables, shops and outbuildings. The residents had from three to five minutes notice of the storm's approach, and were enabled to take refuge in their cellars, so that few of them were injured and none killed outright, but every house but one was beaten down by falling timber or blown away by the wind. The place looks as though it had passed through a long siege and had been mowed down by shot and shell. The work of destruction was all accomplished in less than two minutes, and those who had been rendered houseless could stand and watch the work of destruction going on to the east of them in perfect safety. Wooden bridges were swept away like paper. Twenty-five barns were unroofed in that part of the country. Scores of lives would have been destroyed had it not been for the timely roaring of the wind.

Men and Horses Burned.

Troy, N. Y., Special: An immense canal barn and buildings, occupying one entire block in West Troy, were destroyed by fire last Wednesday night. Thirty-four horses and mules belonging to boatmen perished. While the men were engaged in attempting to rescue the beasts an object dropped from amid the fire and wreck of the loft and was recognized as the body of a man. His hands and face were literally cooked, and frightful burns were found on his knees, hips, shoulders and head. He was still breathing, though unconscious; when he revived he made the startling statement that he and four others were sleeping in the loft when the fire broke out, and that his comrades had doubtless met death in the flames. Search was made for the bodies, but without success.

The Suffering Black Hills.

Owing to the bad condition of the roads and impossibility to haul wood to stations along the line of the Pierre & Black Hills railway, all trains are laid up. The roads throughout the country were never known to be in such a condition. Two freight outfits arrived at Sturgis last night, with only light loads, over a month from Pierre. All the quartz mills will be compelled to shut down very soon unless a change for the better comes, as wood is almost exhausted. The price of wood has taken a jump from $4 to $15; kerosene to $10 per case, and matches 25 cents per box.

Badeau Counted Out.

Judge Ferris, second auditor of the treasury, has made a decision of general interest to army officers, and particularly to those who are on the retired list. The decision is that Gen. Adam Badeau is not in the army, and is improperly borne on its rolls. The case came up upon application for longevity pay under the Taylor decision. His case had been further presented to the department through a recent attempt of his to draw the pay of his rank on the retired list at the same time that he is drawing his salary as consul general at Havana. The decision is based upon the operation of an act of congress by which those officers on the retired list who accept a civil office should be deemed by that act to have resigned their commissions. The decision will, if sustained, affect the status of several officers now on the retired list, and will establish a new ruling of much importance to the army.

A Little Out of His Head.

Hartford Conn., Special:

Capt. J. H. Miller, cashier of the Pratt & Whitney Manufacturing company, was taken to the retreat for the insane in this city a few days ago a raving maniac. To-day it was discovered that the cause of his insanity was detection was an embezzler of over $10,000. He has ranked as one of the leading citizens of Hartford, was a member of a church, a Sunday school teacher, and officer of several charitable institutions. He always made out the pay roll at the factory, and was so able to abstract hundreds of dollars monthly. It is scarcely probable that his speculations would have ever came to light except that the approaching insanity manifested itself first while he was busy with the April pay roll, and the work was so mixed when he left it that an expert was obliged to do it all over after him. Capt. Miller long ago became infatuated by one of the habitues of a variety theater, and placed himself entirely at her mercy, giving her large sums of money under threats of exposure. His wife is one of the most refined and handsome women in Hartford.

The Bones of the Assassin.

The Washington Star says that the bones of Charles J. Guiteau, the assassin of President Garfield, after having been in the Army Medical Museum since July 3 last, have at length lost their identity as his bones. The day following the execution, which took place on the 30th of June, Guiteau's body was interred under the floor of the east wing of the jail. On the night of July 3 it was resurrected by the anatomist, of the museum, Dr. E. F. Schafhert, and taken to the museum. Here the bones were prepared for articulation, and being in fine order for such a purpose, it was supposed that some day or other Guiteau's skeleton would be placed in a glass case in the museum, properly labeled. It was known by a number of clerks and other employes of the museum that the bones were there, but only a few persons have ever been permitted to see them. It has been deemed unadvisable, however to place the skeleton on exhibition as that of Guiteau, for like the cervical vertebræ of the assassin of Lincoln (Wilkes Booth), it would have attracted too large a crowd. Recently Dr. C. H. Crane, the surgical general, took into his personal possession, and he has made a disposal of them of which every other person is ignorant.

East-bound Traffic.

In view of the fact that the bulk of the east-bound traffic is being carried by a few of the roads, numerous charges have been made that these roads were either directly cutting rates or giving a rebate at the east end. It is now claimed that all of this talk has been the result of a scheme to break the pool by either concentrating the bulk of the shipments upon one or two roads or leaving about the same number with practically no traffic, as complaints would become so frequent as to create such dissatisfaction as would cause a withdrawal of some of the lines, and the making of such rates as would take traffic away from the pool lines. In furtherance of this view, it is charged that shippers have selected what roads they will favor, and are steadily pursuing a course that is believed to be rapidly making trouble, which will be the basis of a dissolution of the pool, and cause a war of rates that will be as severe as that of 1881.

The Fate of a Runaway Girl.

Milwaukee, Wis., Special. It will be remembered that the telegraph some six weeks ago reported the elopement of the daughter of a wealthy citizen of Concord, N. H., named Burton, with a traveling man. Burton is a banker and a prominent railroad man, and the loss of his only daughter in this way was a great blow. After spending a large sum for an official inquiry regarding the eloping couple, the heart-broken father and mother determined to set out and try and find them, if possible, Mr. Burton arranged his business to this end. Four weeks ago Monday they started out and have visited all the prominent cities between Chicago and New York. Last Saturday in Chicago, after having made preparations to return to their home, the father and mother heard of a young couple answering the description of the missing pair having bought tickets for Milwaukee. They immediately started for Milwaukee, arriving here Saturday. They called on Superintendent Whitehead of the Humane society and stated their case. That gentleman set to work and had the pleasure of restoring the runaway daughter, whom he had found occupying a room in a tenement house. She had been deserted by her betrayer and was in want. The meeting between parents and daughter was an affecting one. The three started for their Concord home.

Mum Authorities.

The state department and the British legation are deeply imbued with the belief that the public has no right to know anything about the prospective extradition of Sheridan, Walsh and Tynan. Every day it becomes more difficult to get any information from either of the sources where accurate information on this subject is to be found. Everybody about the department and the legation is in a condition of profound ignorance on this particular subject. This renders the verification of current reports extremely difficult. One report which receives some credence is to the effect that about two weeks ago the state department issued a warrant for the arrest of Sheridan. This report seems to have its basis in the sensational reports current in New York. There are others with a like foundation. The best statement of the situation is the following: Some weeks ago the British minister informed the state department that he proposed to secure the arrest of Sheridan. Thereupon the state department issued a mandate, that is a paper giving the enterprise its solemn sanction. Since that time the British legation has made up its official mind to ask neither mandates nor warrants from the state department in those cases. when it wants either Sheridan or Walsh arrested it will get a warrant through the nearest British consul from the nearest United States commissioner. When Tynan found a like course will be pursued. It is known that no steps have been taken in the case of Tynan because he has not been found, and that no steps have been taken in the case of Walsh because the British legation has not received either the charge or the evidence against him. It is just possible that the United States Commissioner Osborne of New York has issued a warrant at the request of the British consul general for the arrest of Sheridan.

The Decapitated Do Not Like It.

Washington Special:—Secretary Folger is meditating upon the proposed reduction of the internal revenue districts. He now has in contemplation a basket of thirty-six heads, which will leave but ninety districts. The saving to the government, even under this process of decimation will be comparatively small. It will be about one-tenth of 1 per cent. upon the amount of revenue collected last year, at a liberal estimate, $150,000. As an economic move, therefore, it would scarcely have been suggested. An official of the department said recently, that the saving would not amount to much in fact, but the reduction had to be made in obedience to a clamor. Wherever a $2,500 collector is discharged, a $1,500 deputy would have to be appointed. In addition to this saving there would be a few hundred dollars difference in the rent paid. It would be difficult to make a saving of $3,000 for each district abolished. Several congressmen are already in the city to see about it. Each has his particular collector whom he thinks should be retained.

Daniel Curley Executed at Dublin.

Daniel Curley, the second man convicted of the murder of Cavendish and Burke, was hanged at Kilmainham jail at 8 last Friday morning. The jail was guarded by a force of military similar to the occasion of the hanging of Brady on Monday last. Canon Kennedy and Father O'Reilly arrived at the prison at an early hour to attend Curley. After the priests had prayed fervently with the condemned man in his cell, mass was celebrated in the prison chapel in the presence of the governor and wardens where Curley received the sacrament. Meanwhile a group of women which had gathered outside the prison were on their knees saying the litany for the dying. When the black flag, announcing that the execution had taken place was hoisted over the prison every man in the crowd outside, which numbered barely 1,000, uncovered his head, and murmurs of sympathy with Curley were uttered. A rush was then made by the crowd for the garden near by, where Curley's relatives were assembled, and where his father was kneeling for the repose of the soul of his son. The people soon dispersed quietly. Curley walked to the scaffold with little assistance and seemed to be resigned to his fate, but was hardly firm. He declined to make any statement touching his connection with the crime for which he was executed. Death was instantaneous. In a letter which Curley wrote to his wife he said: "I will take my secrets to the grave with me and leave those who are at freedom to enjoy it. I will die in peace, forgiving my enemies."

A Bad Week for Trade.

New York, Special Telegram, 19th:—Telegraphic dispatches to Bradstreet's from leading business centers disclose no improvement in the condition of general trade. Business in the east is unsatisfactory, and collections are limited. Trade in the middle states has been only moderately active, and the temper of merchants generally is very conservative. The same general remarks apply to the west, where trade is reported quiet, if not dull. The unsatisfactory condition of trade is attributed in part to the weather, which has considerably retarded business in some lines. There is little or no change to record in the south. The weather, however, has been favorable for planting, which is reported as progressing well. The advices concerning the wheat crop in the south are of an encouraging character.

The New Commissioner of Internal Revenue.

Washington telegram 21st: Walter Evans of Kentucky, on Monday appointed commissioner of internal revenue, is a lawyer of ability, and well known in the politics of his state. He was at one time law partner of Benjamin H. Bristow, in Hopkinsville, Ky., and was a Bristow man at the convention in 1876. In 1880 he was a delegate at large to the Chicago convention and one of the 306 who supported Gen. Grant's candidacy. In 1879 he was a candidate for governor of his state on the republican ticket. He was elected to the lower house of the legislature in 1871, and to the state senate in 1873, from Christian county. He is forty-one years old and has had considerable influence in the distribution of federal patronage. He served as lieutenant in the federal army during the war. Mr. Evans and Postmaster General Gresham are warm personal friends, and it is understood that the latter was instrumental in securing Evans' appointment. The new appointee was qualified and was sworn in to-day at Louisville, the occasion for haste being that the ten days, for which the acting commissioner of internal revenue could be appointed, expired to-day.

Old Time Poetry.

On a visit to the country some time since we were shown an old-time New England Primer, written by Rev. John Cotton in about the year 1635, but it was used in Sunday-schools in the West up to within the last thirty or forty years. We can not refrain from quoting one page:

In Adam's fall
We sinned all.

My book and heart
Must never part.

Young Obadias
David, Josias,
All were pious.

Peter denied
His Lord and cried.

Young Timothy
Learnt soon to fly

Xerxes did die
And so must I.

Zacheus he Did climb the tree
Our Lord to see.

Cutting Heads Off.

You probably know that, in Berlin, when they wish to deprive a criminal of his life they cut him in two at the neck. The executioner that wields the sharp ax is called upon to exercise his functions on an average about once a month. His name is Krauts, a mild-faced old fellow, with a soft, gentle voice, a dandy manner, and white hands, and on these occasions he usually smokes a cigarette. He has four assistants, a quartette of cruel, hard-looking men, whose duty it is to strip the victim. In the case under notice the culprit was suffering the extreme penalty of the law for no less a crime than the murder of his wife and two children. When he had been stripped to the undershirt, the collar of which was cut down to the level of his shoulders, his feet pinioned, and his hands tied behind him he was led out and his head placed upon the block. In the meantime Krauts, the executioner, had stood among the few spectators of the scene, quietly puffing his cigarette, and without anything in his demeanor indicative of his office. When the platform was reached he threw aside his cigarette, grasping the ax in his white, sinewy hands, gave it a swing upward, and struck with a force sufficient to detach the head from the body instantly. The remains were covered with black cloth, and the witnesses, having signed their names, were escorted out of the jail.

I have seen many executions by hanging, and a number by ball and shot, and have witnessed one or two poor victims being keelhauled, but it seems to me that decapitation must be the most brutal—certainly it is the most hideous to contemplate.—London Correspodence Chicago News.

How He Caught His Clerks.

A merchant who kept three clerks, each one of whom made his own change and had free access to the money-drawers, was the other day asked by a commercial traveler why he did not keep a cashier to receive all moneys? "Cost too much," was the reply. "But are your clerks honest?" "Perfectly honest." "Have you any objection to my trying them?" "Certainly not; go ahead in any way you wish." The traveler went away, but in about three hours he returned, and said in a loud voice so that all might hear: "When I was here this morning I paid you a bogus quarter by mistake. In case you find it in counting up to-night, lay it aside, and I'll redeem it." Then the traveler, accompanied by the merchant, took position where the back door and the alley could be kept in view, and in less than ten minutes out came the head clerk and emptied a handful of silver on the head of a barrel, and pawed it over. The bogus quarter was not there. He returned to the store and out came a second clerk, and went through the same programme. He was followed by a third, and after he disappeared the merchant calmly observed: "I've been waiting thirteen years for trade to pick up, and I rather guess I'll try the cashier system."

In-breeding in Pigs.

On the subject of in-breeding in pigs F. D. Curtis, in the Rural New Yorker says: "An old farmer told me his father bred his pigs together without any new blood for thirty years, without any damage to them. At the end of thirty years the pigs were born blind and he gave up in-breeding. This story does not accord with my experiments. After three in-breedings I noticed defects, and at four constitutional weakness and deformities. In-breeding will speedily run out any breed of hogs, and in-crosses should never be made more than twice. Brothers and sisters may be in-bred without reducing the value of the stock, provided their sires and dams are not related. I say "may be," not "should be." The offspring of in-bred pigs are weak and hard to raise. There is no task so hard in stock-breeding as to fix types in pigs, on account of the damage in in-breeding and the difficulty of establishing uniformity except by close-breeding. It is an art requiring time, patience and careful observation, and these are the reasons so few Americans have ever attempted to establish new breeds of pigs.

The funded debt of New York amounts to $96,094,534, while the floating debt contracted in anticipation of taxes is $9,235,734.

County News.

Fisher's Fancies.

From the Bulletin.

Joe. Roberton is about to start on a reconnoissance of Montana county.

Business of all kinds is picking up about these times.

It is rumored that Capt. B. F. Zarracher will return to his Fisher farm this summer.

The Manitoba bridge inspecting car has been switched near the depot this week. The inspectors have been overhauling the Morais bridge.

Miss Anna Steenerson has been out to her land claim near St. Hilaire for a time past, but is now returned to her position as assistant in the postoffice.

The drive well sunk on Front Street may result in a big bonanza. It is hard; bitter and transparent. If there ever was a worse tasting water on earth the writer knows not its latitude. It is bad enough to convert into a medicinal water well.

John Fosberg, the Crookston photographer, designs taking views of the prominent features in Fisher scenery, which he will offer for sale. His ability as a first-class photograph artist is well known, and his views can not be otherwise than well made.

School District No. 18, has secured a competent principal in the person of the Rev. S. N. Griffith, lately principal of the Moseley School, Chicago, Ill. The Professor, although he has a reverend prefix, which does not appear to militate against him, is a teacher of large experience, prepared to instruct in all branches preparatory to a collegiate course, or for business pursuits. He ought to make of our schools what was intended when the tax-payers of the district so liberally contributed for the erection of both the primary and advanced school buildings, the very best schools in the Northwest.

Haseltine Bros. of the Crookston Nursery, are now delivering trees, shrubs and plants, contracted last fall. Aclimated strawberry plants from this Nursery are sure to thrive if they have half a chance. We notice that the firm have a large plat of fine vines, which they cultivate for berries. Last year they sold three hundred and fifty dollars worth of berries from a small plat of vines. They have four times as many bearing vines this season.

The Elzevir Library.

Among the recent issues of this unique, and in respect to cheapness and beauty of form and typo-graphy, really remarkable publication, are the following: "Aristotle,' by Sir Alexander Grant; "Plato," by C. W. Collins; Horace," by Theodore Martin. These are in the famous and excellent "Ancient Classics for English Readers" series, heretofore obtainable only at the price of $1,00 each, but now published in this handsome form for 15 cents each. "The Indian song of songs,' by Edwin Arnold, author of "The Light of Asia," is published at 6 cents, the cheapest edition heretofore issued being $1,00 We also have the "Life of Alex. H. Stephens," by F. H. Norton, author of "Life of Gen. Hancock," and other works. It contains an excellent portrait, and a fine illustration of "Liberty Hall," Mr. Stephens" famous home. Though a copyright work, paying the usual royalty to the author, it is published at the astonishing price of 10 cents. The last issue is Schiller's celebrated "Song of The Bell," and "Hero and Leander," all for 2 cents. These publications are not sold by dealers generally, but only direct, by the publishers, John B. Alden, 18 Vesey St., New York.

Buffalo County, (Wis) Journal: Last week on Wednesday, Jac. Warninger and John Meisser, of this place, left with eight head of horses, a wagon, a sulky, and other articles, for Crookston, Minn., and on Thursday, J. M. Leonhardy started to join them.

Warren Sheaf: While at Crookston the other day we stepped into the U. S. Land Office and made the acquaintance of Hon. John Cromb, Register. We found him to be just such a gentleman as he had been represented to be—a perfect gentleman, affable and courteous.

Glyndon Dairy Stock Sale

Mr. C. B. Kittridge was notably successful in his first annual cattle sale, last Thursday afternoon. Twenty-two cows and a bull, at auction, brought $1,322, averaging $57.50 per head! There was not a large crowd of buyers or spectators, but those present were there for business. Mr. Kittredge had got good ready beforehand, numbering each animal, and furnishing information from the records of age, date of calving, yield of milk etc., besides showing samples of milk and cream from each cow. The first animal sold was a grade cow for $54.50 to A. E. Hall. A handsome red Durham brought $69 from J. P. Hegestrom. A. M. Burdick paid $60.50 for a grade Jersey. A. C. Andrews got a fair family cow for $40. Jerome Daniels purchased three grades, strong Jersey blood, paying $63, $60 and $71, the latter a handsome heifer of Mr. Kittredge's own raising. A. E. Hall's purchases were six head, aggregating $337. Robert Moir bought a good milker at $68.50. A. M. Burdick took two fine cows at $60.50 and $56. Most of the buyers embraced the offer of six months time, cash payments footing up scant $300.

Mr. Kittredge has been seven years in the milk business, commencing in the spring of '76 with 12 cows. He will have another herd one of these days and could replace his late one out of the proceeds of his auction. But he needs rest, and will take it.—Glyndon News.

Things a Farmer Should Not Do.

A farmer should never break up more land than he can cultivate thoroughly; half-tilled land is always growing poorer, while well tilled land is constantly improving. A thrifty and prudent farmer will not devote his sole attention to the improvement of certain fields on his farm, because the land is "easy to work at," and let other portions of his premises go uncultivated, and grow nothing but brush, bogs, briers and stones.

A farmer should never have more cattle, horses or other animal stock than he can keep in good order. An animal in good order at the beginning of winter is already half wintered. Nor should he let his cattle endure the chilling storms of winter in an open yard or field, whilst a few dollars expended in the way of making comfortable stables would amply repay him in saving fodder, and afford a greater amount of milk.

A farmer should never depend too much on his neighbors for what he can by careful management produce on his own land. He should not make it a common practice to either buy or beg fruit while he can plant trees and cultivate them on his own ground —nor annoy his neighbors by borrowing tools to work with, while he can make or buy them. "The borrower is servant to the lender."

A farmer should never be so immersed in political matters as to neglect doing his various kinds of work in due season, and to snug up matters and things for winter; nor should he be so inattentive to politics as to remain ignorant of those great questions of national and state policy which will always agitate more or less a free people.

A farmer should not be continually borrowing his neighbor's newspaper, while he can easily save money enough, by curtailing some little extravagance, to subscribe and pay for one or more of his own.

A farmer should never refuse a fair price for anything he wishes to sell. I have known men to refuse a dollar and a half for a bushel of wheat, and after keeping it five or six months they were glad to get a dollar for it. I have known farmers to refuse to take a fair marketable price for their dairies of butter, and after keeping it three or four months they concluded to sell the butter for only two-thirds of the price which they were first offered. "A bird in the hand is worth two in the bush."

A farmer should not allow his wood-pile to be reduced down to the "shorts," merely drawing a little by piecemeal, and green at that. He must expect to encounter the sour looks of his wife and family, and perhaps be compelled (in a series of lectures) to learn that the who provides green wood to burn in the winter, has not mastered the first rules of domestic economy. Nor should he employ some "botch" mason to build his chimney "upside down" so that his family will be nearly smoked out of the house, and the walls of the room become as yellow as saffron

A farmer should not let his buildings look as old as the hills, and go to decay, while he can easily afford the means to keep them in good repair; nor should he allow tattered clothes and old hats to be stuffed in the windows, in place of glass. If he does, he need not be alarmed if he acquires the reputation of a mean man, or one who tarries long where liquor is sold by the glass.—[Cor. Working Farmer.

County News.

Red Lake Falls Doings.

From the Messenger.

Garden making is progressing well in various portions of town.

The barn on W. A. Schreiter's farm, 3 miles from town was destroyed by fire last week. Loss covered by insurance, in the Springfield Fire and Marne.

Surveyor Brainard has made some progress with the work of taking levels for the village board, and when it is completed, grades will be fixed at once.

Our telephone line was broken twice within ten days, and we understand that on both occasions the break was caused by careless drivers colliding with the poles.

The approaches to the Clearwater bridge will be put in thorough order whenever the right of way over a little strip of private property is secured by the village, which will probably be within a very few days.

Mr. Kretzschmar is a boomer, and no mistake. He has had poles set for a private telephone line from his office to the mill race, and the wires will probably be strung soon. We expect to see this grow into a fully established local telephone system before many months.

St. Hilaire Happenings.

From the Spectator.

Major Mix, in life size, is in town to day, visiting his family. Major says we are going to get the Railroad at once.

Rev. F. K. Roberts and wife, of Crookston passed through town on Monday, on their way to their farm a few miles north of town.

Alderman Box and J. G. McKenzie, of Crookston, registered at the European to day. Mr B. is up inquiring the price of town lots and looking over his claim, while Mac. is looking after the interests of the brick yard.

We are indebted to Dr. Thomas, of Crookston, for the very pleasant call which he gave us on Monday last. The Doctor was on his way to his farm a few miles north of here, and stopped a couple of hours to admire the Young Chicago. He had with him some thoroughbred Jersey stock which he is putting on his farm.

The Thief River Country is destined to undergo one of these magical transformations in development during the coming year that is consistent only in new countries of equal advantage. A big boom in new towns is generally disastrous to most classes of business, but the improvement of a new country can never be too rapid for healthy growth. In this new country can be found the very best of soil extending 40 miles north of St. Hilaire, and embracing lands of a character to suit any tastes. Springs and streams are found in great abundance, and prairie or timber lands may be had from choice. The timber consists of oak, poplar, elm, ash and pine. The greater part of these lands are rapidly taken and the prospects are that in five or six months the best of it will all be picked out, and then look out for a rise in prices. Of the land that is taken up a large amount is under cultivation and every season the acreage of grain sowed increases about 300 per cent. In almost every case the owner of the land is an actual settler and is cultivating and improving this tract. The prospects for a bountiful harvest next fall are better than ever before and the No. 1 Hard shipped from this section will be no small quantity of the large amount raised in the Red River Valley.

Carman Carvings.

Courier.

Messrs. D. A. Darby and K. Knudson departed Monday morning for their respective claims near Thief river, expecting to be absent for some days.

Mr. E. D. Childs has parties engaged in extending the sidewalk from his office to the boarding house. This will add materially to the appearance of the premises and lift the predestrian far above the mud.

New settlers are continually taking advantage of the excellent opportunities offered by Polk county and are flocking to our midst in unprecedented numbers. Come while yet there is room and secure a pleasant home.

By dispatches published elsewhere in this issue of the Courier it will be discovered that railway charters have been granted by the State to the Brainerd & Northwestern, and Lake Superior & Northwestern. The latter runs from Duluth, on the head of Superior Lake, to Grand Forks. There is every reason to suppose that this road will pass through, or immediately south of Carman, as the difficulties to be surmounted on the opposite side of the river are of such a character as to necessitate a large outlay for right of way. The other line is to begin at Brainerd and extend northwest to Warren in Marshall county, with a branch line passing through Carman to Grand Forks. There is but little doubt that one, and perhaps both these trunk lines will be built at an early day as the country through which they have been laid out is rich in the production of all kind of cereals for which the Red River valley is becoming famous. Carman seems to be the point most accessible for crossing the St. Paul, Minneapolis & Manitoba Railroad, and their assurance cannot fail to enchance the value of real estate throughout this section.

County News.

Red Lake Falls Doings.

From the Messenger.

Visitors are numerous in all parts of town.

Seeding is about done and wheat is up well in many places.

There are yet some good homesteads to be had in eastern Polk county.

John Kahler is the happy father of an eight pound girl. She put in an appearance on the 14th inst.

Jacobus, of telephone fame, strung the wire for Kretzschmar's private telephone line from the office to the race last Monday. It is a neat job.

Mrs. C. Kretzschmar has been troubled with asthma for sometime, and her many friends will regret to learn that she is very ill with it at present with no indications of improvement.

O. F. Buse got back to town on Friday last with his drive of logs. A few slipped under the boom, but caught in the rapids below, and can easily be got out, the balance are all safe in the boom and race, and are a fine lot.

Early Sunday evening a fire broke out in Smith & Phelen's feed store, among some articles of furniture stored there, belonging to Mr. Wm. Smith. Happily the fire was discovered so soon, that the damage was but trifling.

East Grand Forks, Facts

From the Courier.

Arne Higdem is going to lay out an addition to East Grand Forks.

Deputy-Sheriff Dwyer is this week busy summoning a grand jury for the June term of court.

J. W. Lewis of the Lewis House, caught a twenty-three pound cat-fish in the Red River, last Wednesday.

Rev. E. C. Dunn, of the Presbyterian clergy, who arrived here from Fairfield, N. J. yesterday, will locate among us. This denomination will shortly build a handsome little church. Rev. Dunn is a gentleman of energy and ability and will be a valuable acquisition to East Grand Forks. Services next Sunday.

We are to have a bonanza farm in these parts shortly. Mr. A. C. Pray, of Minneapolis was in town last week and has purchased two thousand acres of land seven miles north-east of this place. He is delighted with East Grand Forks, and has purchased six teams through our popular livery men, the Dwier Bros.

St. Hilaire Happenings.

From the Spectator.

Messrs. Sandy McKinnon and Max Eriesson, two of Crookston's heavy men are in town looking up investments in St. Hilaire soil.

The claim shanty belonging to Herb Mason, of Crookston, and situated on his claim a few miles north of this place was burned by a prarie fire one day last week.

The seeding in this part of the country is nearly all finished and in many places wheat is growing nicely. The warm rain which we had last week has helped it along wonderfully.

Immigration to this country still continues. Among the new arrivals is a young "tenderfoot" who came to the house of Mr. Robert Clark on Wednesday last. As yet he has not displayed much ability as a farmer, still Mr. Clark is almost tickled to death over his arrival, for he says, he is the picture of his daddy. He weighs twelve pounds and his mother is doing well.

Carman Carvings.

Courier.

Tuesday last Messrs. E. D. Childs Co. had the misfortune to loose one of their draught horses. The driver was engaged in breaking when the animal dropped dead.

Rev. Page of the Crookston Congregationalist church, exchanged pulpits with Rev. Roberts last Sabbath and delivered a very eloquent sermon in this place at 10 o'clock.

Mr. D. H. Bates has had a coat of paint placed on the exterior of his dwelling house that adds materially to the looks of the premises. Let others of our citizens do likewise.

Mr. White, one of Maple Lake's recent additions, was in Carman yesterday. He with his family propose locating at some point near that body of water, and already have part of their goods here.

One would think by the tone of the Messenger that Red Lake Falls is destined to become a great railway center, and that every road in Minnesota is to pass through the town. Come Brother divide up with your less fortunate neighbors.

Our enterprising fellow townsman, W. D. Bailley, received two car loads of lumber last week from Duluth for the erection of additional buildings upon his premises. We are not aware of the sort of buildings that will be reared therefrom.

Mrs. Bruce, the mother of our townslady, Mrs. H. A. Stone, is lying very low at her home several miles south of here from a long continued attack of sickness. The lady is quite aged, but her many friends hope that her recovery may be speedy.

Residents of Carman are pleased to notice that many of the citizens are beautifying their homes by the addition of varied coats of paint. The latest one to move in this direction is Mr. George Beauvaise, who is having the Montreal House brightened up by the addition of a coat of paint. He is having his house beautified in a way that cannot fail to attract the weary traveler within his domain.

Grand Forks Herald: Sheep raising in Dakota is a success. The few experiments which have been tried in the Red River Valley have proved eminently satisfactory. Sheep are able to stand the peculiar North Dakota winters better than any other domestic animal. The most valuable testimony comes from S. R. Selmes, a prominent Mandan sheep raiser. He has about three thousand head of sheep on a ranch of 15,000 acres and expects to increase them to eleven or twelve thousand head the coming season. Mr. Selmes commenced upon his present experiment last year, and so far the results have more than met his most sanguine expectations. Not-withstanding the fact that the past winter was the most severe known in the Missouri valley for years, his flocks were unhoused the entire time, and were able to get all the food they required except for some twenty-three days, when a little hay was furnished them, coming out in the spring hearty and full of vigor, and with extra heavy fleeces of wool of a very superior quality.

Here is how a brother journalist puts it: We suppose that many people think that newspaper men are persistent duns; let a farmer place himself in a similar business position and see if he would not do the same. Suppose he raised 1000 bushels of wheat, and his neighbors should come and buy a bushel and the price was only a small matter of $2 or less, and the neighbor says; "I will pay the amount in a few days." As the farmer did not want to be small about the matter, he says all right, and the man leaves with the wheat. Another comes in the same way until the whole 1000 bushels of wheat is trusted out to 1000 different persons, and not one of the purchasers concerns himself about it. It is a small amount that he owes the farmer, and of course that would not help him any. He does not realize that the farmer has frittered away his large crop of wheat, and that the value is due him in a thousand little driblets, and that he is seriously embarrassed in his business because his debtors treat it as a little matter. But if all would pay him promptly, which they could do as well as not, it would be a very large amount to the farmer, and would enable him to carry on his business without difficulty. The above comparison is too true of the difficulties that a newspaper man has to contend with.—[Hudson Star and Times.

"book-Farming."

Time was when with no inconsiderable class of tillers of the soil it was the habit to speak contemptuously of agricultural books and farm journals, but in these days it is seldom that ignorance thus asserts itself. It has come to be well understood that something more than brute force is necessary to success in farming. Brain now cuts a larger figure in all departments of rural pursuits than brawn. Modern methods and improved processes, growing out of higher knowledge in all that pertains to agriculture, have, within a comparatively brief period, revolutionized the ancient ways and practices which were long followed.

The same idea is pertinently put by Major Alvord in a recent number of one of our Eastern exchanges. "The farmer (he says) must apply to himself, and to the son or sons to succeed him, a standard similar to that by which he measures the qualifications of his doctor or his minister. It is unfortunate that farmers are so slow in doing this. No one ever heard of a physician fresh from his schools and books being sneered at as a "book doctor.' On the contrary all doctors without a complement of book-learning, scientific training, are shunned and denominated as "quacks" Yet very recently it was common for farmers of the olden style to look with pity, if not suspicion, upon those who studied agriculture as a science and undertook its practice with a progressive spirit, and to call such "book-farmers." Happily such errors are passing away; book-farmers, well-educated farmers are making themselves felt, winning respect and finding an appreciation of their enterprise. Let us hope the time is not distant when book-farmers, in the best sense, shall be in the majority. Then, perhaps, "quacks" will be found in farming. The fact is at present, quack-farmers, are too plenty and book-farmers too few."

But it is needless to enlarge on this fact. No intelligent man now disputes it; and very few are left of that dogmatic and ignorant class, who used to sneer at what they called "book farming," because unable to discern that the books and journals which were the special object of their stupid aversion were but the recorded experience, either of farmers themselves or of the investigations of men of science, whose investigations and discoveries are of the highest value to the cause of agriculture.—[Prairie Farmer.

Div. Supt. D. K. Smith has resigned. We learn that he intends to go to Denver, Col., to accept a position on the U. P. Railroad.

The ladies festival at Lawrence Hall last Thursday evening was a grand affair, well patronized and yielded a handsome revenue.

Some enterprising genius has erected a lemonade stand on Ash St., facing Houston Avenue. Looks like trade was thriving with him.

Terry & Collins have taken possession of their new quarters corner of Main and Fourth Streets and have every thing in ship-shape ready for business.

John Hunter has hied him to Maple Bay for a while and orders his JOURNAL to follow him thither, as all true fellows have done who have gone this way before.

To-day is the last day of grace before taxes became delinquent and such a rush as there is at the court house convinces one that a spasm of honesty has suddenly taken the thrifty taxpayer.

County Treasurer Lucken has been rushed by applications for tax receipts, as the time to attach the penalty approaches. He ought to have three or four assistants in order to keep up with the rush of work.

S. W. Ritchie's 250 cords of wood is beginning to string along and is being caught by the boom—Not by the city boom but the small boom built across the river below the railroad bridge for the purpose of catching that wood.

Misses Dollie and Pet Bunnel went to St. Paul on Thursday evening last where Miss Dollie intends to remain for three months to take lessons in vocal and instrumental music. Pet will return, after a visit of a week or so, to comfort her inconsolable pets, Turk and [illegible].

Go to the Sherman House if you want a good bath.

The post-office was closed between 9 a. m., and 5 p. m., on decoration day.

Rev. F. K. Roberts has returned home and will be in his place as usual on Sunday next.

The Glyndon News says that the circus that is to be in our city June 1st is a large-sized fraud.

Mr. Martial Filiatrault has fixed his dooryard up in splendid shape and is putting a neat wire fence about it.

Ed. Walsh is putting in a neat wire fence along the walk, front of his dooryard, on the Reynolds property.

LaFortune, the man who was arrested by the Sheriff's little pop, is gaining rapidly and will soon be as good as new it is said.

Buildings are going up on Sampson's Addition at a rapid rate. At this rate there will soon be a big city over there calling for a bridge,

Angus wants a good hotel. It has become a shipping center for the best wheat raising section of the valley, and a hotel there will pay well.

Remenyi, the great violinest expresses great delight in this New Northwest and what he has seen of its wonderful progress. He threatens to visit us again in the future.

Prof. Carruth says the Angus people are well fixed for school building and children to fill it. Will some intelligent young lady who will go there to teach please hold up her right hand?

The Phosa McAllister Comedy Company played "Marton, the Pride of the Market," followed by the farce, "Slasher and Crasher" on Friday night to a full house. This company is deservedly popular in this city.

Mr. J. R. Clements has built a fine conservatory on the east side of his residence. He has a fine house and grounds and one evening this week our reporter saw him busily engaged in the yard with a lawn mower.

Charlie Brandtjin, representing Marder Luse & Co., Minneapolis, gave us a pleasant call on Wednesday. This is his first visit to our city and he is very favorably impressed with what he saw of us. He represents one of the soundest institutions in the country.

Lo! the halcyon days of summer are here and the big man with the asthmatic hand organ and the small monkey is monkeying about the streets after the nimble sixpence and the small boy's Sunday school penny; and verily he getteth both with no equivalent return therefor.

John Alderman reports that the St. Hilaire track, on Wednesday when he came down was completed to within one mile of Black River and that it would doubtless reach Black River tonight. The dwellers at St. Hilaire are jubilant over the prospects of soon enjoying a railroad to the outside world.

In the report of the special meeting of the Board which we printed last week an error appeared which breaks the Marais people all up. It was in relation to the contract for their bridge awarded to P. McDonald and read "$6,807.50." It should have read $687.50 which was the true amount. We find that even printers will make mistakes some times, be they ever so careful.

Mrs. Hobart, wife of Chauncey Hobart, D. D., of Red Wing, President of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union of Minnesota, will deliver one of her famous Temperance lectures in the M. E. church, on Friday evening next, June 1st, at 8 o'clock. Mrs. Hobart is recognized as the ablest lady speaker of the State, a veteran in the Temperance cause. She requests the ladies of the city to meet her in the Baptist chapel at 3:30 p. m., on the day of the lecture.

Well, the great Remenyi has been before a Crookston audience and we presume to say that none were dissatisfied. We are not enough of a musician to be a critic but even we could see that a master hand drew the bow invoking any kind of sound he chose from the mysterious depths of that violin. The actor seemed to regard his instrument as human, looking lovingly upon and smiling to it as the music welled forth in rills and volumes. We don't know that Remenyi is the best violinist in existence, suffice it to say that his power is truly wonderful and all missed a treat who missed the opportunity of hearing him.

Bath rooms at the Sherman House.

John Friedrich, of Red Wing, was in the city this week, attending to the payment of his taxes in this county.

Try the Vally Bakery for a nice dish of ice cream. The JOURNAL force know how it is—by hearsay.

The Valley Bakery has ice cream parlors. You can take your best girl there and order your fresh ice cream piping hot.

Joe Roberton, Rob Bain, Tom Nesbit, Jim Nesbit and Dav. Morrow, of the Marais, were in the city to-day (Thursday) enroute for a survey of the 13 townships withdrawn lands.

A new post office is about to be created in Fairfax township with Wm. Marin as post-master. (Faix an' its Joe phat will be the broth av a bye for postmaster, intirely!) The name of the post office will be Marin.

Herb Mason is getting his goods in the new store. He has got some splendid cigars—we know it because we stood on the sidewalk and saw him go by with an armful of boxes and we gazed upon the covers until our mouth watered.

Rumors of a big opera house, to be located on the Bivins property, on the corner of Broadway and Robert Street, beigin to take definite shape. We are told that over $8,000 are pledged and that the prospects for a grand opera house are bright.

The ball given by the members of the Northwestern Band, in Ericsson's Hall, on Thursday evening last, was a splendid affair in every particular, and, we are told, netted a handsome sum to the boys. This is as it should be. If the boys are liberally patronized they can get up and sustain a fine band which is one of the needs of the city.

C. F. Kindred, whom somebody informs us was running for Congress in the Fifth District last year from early in the spring until sometime last fall,—in November, if we are rightly informed, until he "heard from Cass and Itasca," was in the city this week taking counsel with the faithful. Wonder if it is capturing the organization they are after?

The Lee & Herrick flouring mill frame looms up conspicuously and in a short time will appear to the delighted beholder, a mammoth flouring mill and when the No. 1 Hard shall come tumbling into market next fall there will be a place prepared to grind a large quantity The mill on Sampson's addition is following suit as rapidly as possible.

There does not seem to be a very remarkable boom transpiring this summer, but if one goes to the land office at any hour of the day and beholds the large land office force on the jump, attending to the business there being done, he would get the idea that something was going on within this land district, and so there is. Land is being taken right lively for actual settlement, and it will not be many years before the choice quarters will all be gone.

Mr. D. Z. Horton, of Maple Lake was in the city last week, making arrangements for a straw burning engine. He will run two threshing machines next fall. He reports prospects good out there, seed all in, grain up and looking nicely. Strong talk of a telephone to this city from Markham's store at Maple Bay. They also expect a new drug store and a blacksmith shop. Verily the young city on Maple Lake boometh exceedingly and waxeth great.

John Van Tuyl, of Maple Lake, favored the JOURNAL with a pleasant call while in the city this week. He says crops are all in good growing condition. There were signs of a frost at Al. Robinson's—in fact Al. rather expected one and only prevented it by coming to Crookston and changing it to Mrs. Robinson—said lady arriving from Maine, Broome Co., N. Y., on Saturday. Thus, by meeting life's threatened dangers half-way they become life-long blessings in many cases as in this one. May Robin's-sons be never blighted by the frosts of adversity.

As the time for the Teachers Institute draws on apace the Superintendent will soon be wanting to know what disposition will be made of his guests. In every city in the Northwest in which an Institute has been held those in attendance have been the guests of the city and Crookston, it seems, is bound not to be behind as some of her citizens have expressed a willingness to entertain to the extent of their ability. As yet there have not been sufficient offers made to accommodate the many who will come and it would greatly facilitate matters, and aid the Superintendent, who has already done a great deal of work in this cause, if all who are able and willing to receive guests for the week would communicate with Mr. Carruth informing him how many they can take. It is a cause which our citizens should and doubtless do take a pride in aiding, and we trust that the responses will be numerous and hearty.

Ho, Comrades!

Dont forget Maj. Riddell's lecture on Tuesday evening next at the Baptist church. Let's all turn out and give an old comrade in arms a rousing welcome. Every ex-soldier in this vicinity should be there in uniform or otherwise as the case may be, only BE THERE.

The New Era Grader.

This machine is making a vast difference in the character of Polk County lowlands, making them as early as the high lands and more productive. The low lands are the best and only need draining; this, the New Era is successfully doing wherever used. There have been, this season one carload shipped to Ada, in Norman County, one carload to Warren, in Marshall County and one carload to Crookston, most all of which are now engaged. The towns are taking advantage of the law which allows them to bond the town for twenty years in the sum of $5,000 or less and they are all going for a grader and ditcher. The town of Sullivan have done a wise thing. They bond for the full amount, buy a machine, buy horses to run it and hire a crew of men for the season. The result will be that Sullivan will have better roads and ditches and more of them this year than she would have in any other way in ten years. Euclid buys a machine and hires teams of Geo B. Ellis at $10.75 per day. They will grade one mile in four days which will cost $67.00. To do the same work, with men and scrapers, making a ditch 2 feet deep and 8 feet wide on both sides of the road with a high grade for a road bed would cost $320, thus a saving of $253 for every mile of road built is apparent. It is estimated that one ditcher, properly handled can build 40 miles of such roads during the working season. The town of Fisher procured one grader last year, and graded 26 miles of road, and so well are they pleased with it that one of the board of supervisors, Mr. J. B. Merrill, has this spring bought one for his own private use. Many towns are making arrangements for a grader and every town that needs good roads and ditches should do so. We have, at the JOURNAL office all of the necessary blanks and instructions how to proceed with the bonding business and feeling a deep interest in the subject of ditching and road grading we shall be pleased to forward to town clerks, supervisors or any town officers who would like to introduce a grader into their town a full set of blanks which will enable them to issue their bonds. We shall have more to say on this subject hereafter.

NEWS OF THE STATE.

The Text Book Law

St. Paul, May 22, 1883.—To county auditors: In reply to frequent inquiry by auditors concerning the operation of the text book law:

1. The eight per cent. commission to text-book agents must be paid out of the "school funds rising from county taxation," which is the one mill tax. The general statement of the law presumes that this tax is held in a general fund and the commission deducted before distribution to the districts is made. But in some counties, this tax is credited to districts immediately upon its collection which makes this plan unpracticable. In other counties at any given settlement at which commissions are deducted, some districts may have paid their entire tax, while other districts may have paid but a small part of theirs. In such a case the commissions due would be paid by districts unequally, each district paying its share in proportion to its promptness in paying its taxes. This will be unjust.

The essential requirement of this law is, that the commission shall be paid pro rata out of this one mill tax.

The following plan is recommended as the most satisfactory, in being practicable and fully meeting the requirements of the law.

After the auditor has received an estimate from the county superintendent of how many books will be needed and sold in the county, by reckoning 8 per cent. of that amount he knows the amount of commission to be paid during the year. Knowing also the aggregate amount of the mill tax, he can determine the per cent. of the mill tax to be set apart for commissions. Let the auditor, then, establish a "commission fund" and credit to this fund the required per cent. of each collection of the one-mill tax. Out of this commission fund, agents' commissions would be paid as they become due.

Taking the sales of the past year as a basis, counties which are supplying their schools through agents should set apart about 1 per cent. of the one-mill tax.

It must be understood that this commission is paid pro rata by all districts without regard to how many or how few books they buy.

2. The books themselves are to be paid for by the county. The commissioners are required to "make provision for the payment of the price." This general statement seems to imply that a fund be set aside for the payment to the state, and to be collected from county agents upon the sale of the books.

3. Books received from district clerks may be paid for out of the fund provided by the commissioners; otherwise, not until the books are sold.

The State Board of Corrections and Charities.

The state board of corrections and charities met at the capitol Tuesday morning. There were present Gov. Hubbard, Gen. Berry of Winona, Hon. H. R. Wells, Preston, Judge Young, Minneapolis, Hon. W. W. Campbell, Litchfield, and Dr. Dana, St. Paul. The office of permanent secretary was tendered Rev. H. H. Hart, of Worthington, and it is understood that he will accept.

Rev. Dr. Dana, a member of the board, submitted a lengthy report on the objects in view, which was spread upon the records. It showed the uses of boards of inspection in general—the statements covering the same ground as did those made at length in the last legislature when the bill creating the board was under discussion. It will be necessary for the board, and especially its secretary, to be thoroughly informed as to the methods obtaining in public institutions of other states, and correspondence with similar boards must be opened and kept up. Dr. Dana further says:

To an extent we may not anticipate will careful and thorough inspection reveal abuses existing, particularly in city jails and county poor houses. It is in the county poor house mismanagement and abuses are most likely to exist, because of insufficient appropriations, or because county boards are constituted without reference to the duties they have to perform. Hence it comes to pass that the insane have been found so often mingled with the inmates of the poor house; that young children have been found growing up therein in idleness, and lothing habits of vice; that in country jails the sexes are not separated properly, and that the cells are overcrowded; that offenders committed for the first time are often imprisoned with hardened criminals while awaiting trial, and are by the latter initiated into ways of crime, and our city prisons thus converted into schools of vice and crime.

The board, after transacting other business, adjourned to meet July 10 at 10 a. m.

Wm. P. Tanner of Cannon Falls died recently from the effects of a dose of nux vomica, given him by mistake by his wife.

Austin's young artist, Master Halfred Oleson, is going to prepare an original drawing to illustrate Alfred Domett's Christmas Hymn and compete for the $3,000 prize offered by the Harper's for the best original drawing of this hymn, to be the exclusive work of an American artist not over twenty-five years of age.

The gold excitement at Granite Falls is increasing. One lead having developed alleged gold, parties have bought the right to prospect it for $200, and, after a depth of of sixteen feet is reached, if they wish to continue to develop the mine they are to pay $2,300 more. Arrangements are also about completed for opening the Smith lead.

Near Elmore, Minn., recently, an eleven-year-old son of Louis Klein was killed by being thrown from a horse and dragged by his foot catching in the stirrup.

Most Tragic of Tragedies.

From the Montevideo Razon.

A horrible affair took place recently at Rio Grande del Sur, near to the Uruguayan frontier. A young farmer was bitten by a mad dog, and remedies was immediately applied to the wound. Cauterization was resorted to, and there was every reason to believe that the virus had not entered the victim's system. When the accident occurred the young man was about to marry, but in consequence of the untoward occurrence the ceremony was postoned for three months, when the medical men who were consulted on the case gave it as their unanimous opinion that there was not the slightest ground for apprehending any danger from the bite. The marriage took place on the farm and was celebrated with the customary festivities. After the nuptial supper was over the bridegroom appeared to be seized with a fit of melancholy. One of love's caprices, said somebody. After supper came the ball, and when this was at its height the newly-wedded couple withdrew from the festive scene and retired to their apartment.

About an hour afterwards the house resounded with ferocious cries intermingled with shrieks and groans. As soon as the guests had recovered from stupefaction, they started in the direction of the cries. They proceeded from the nuptial chamber. The door was burst open and a horrible spectacle presented itself. On the floor lay the young bride in a pool of blood. She still breathed, but her body was torn and bitten as if she had been seized by a tiger. In a corner of the room was the bridegroom, covered with blood and foaming at the mouth, scratching, biting and tearing away at the wall and furniture. With a sudden bound he sprang like a tiger upon the invaders of his lair, and he would have made one or more victims had not a brother of the dying bride sent a bullet crashing through the mad man's brain.

Prize Fighters' Hands.

The champion light-weight, Billy Edwards, said: "It is not the big hand that deals the hard blow, but what is behind it. Sullivan has a big strong hand on him, and Slade's is, I understand, large, but that is worth nothing in calculating their chance in a fight. A big, soft hand is too much like a boxing-glove to be of much account. My hand is perhaps a little larger than most men of my weight have, but that comes from the work I did shoveling sand and handling heavy weights in a foundry when I was young, and afterward in riveting boilers. The third and fourth fingers are the ones that do most of the work in a fight, not the knuckle of the second, as many imagine. They are consequently the ones that suffer the most. I broke these fingers on my right hand on Collyer, May 2, 1870, in the round of the fight, but hardly noticed it, and went on through the fight using them as if they had not been harmed. But when I broke that bone in the middle of my left hand on Tim Collins, in the second round on May 25, 1871 it effectually settled my use of that hand during the rest of the night. I could hardly have killed a fly with it, and had to do all my work with the right hand. Pete McCoy has a smallish hand—yes, I may say, very small—and he is a very good man. Professor McClellan has a large hand for a man of his size, but that, no doubt, comes from his having formerly been a sailor. Handling the ropes of a vessel is certain to develop the hands, and the salt water toughens and hardens them. Arthur Chambers has a smallish hand—not much of a cutting hand, so far as I can see, but a good, solid hand. Mace has a middle-sized hand, and so has Joe Coburn. Perhaps Coburn's hands are a little large for his size, but he is a big man. Sayers had not a very large hand not as large as this new man, Mitchell, has. I think Mitchell's hands are of quite good size. What a man requires in the ring is solidity, not size of hand. The pickle I have used has been composed of vinegar, alum, lemon juice, horseradish, and sometimes tartaric acid and rock salt. Copperas I do not use, as it is poisonous, and, in my opinion, dangerous. Simple salt water is very good. The main thing, however, is rubbing. If you want to harden your hands keep rubbing them frequently and hard. It may take a little longer than pickling would, but will be a much less unpleasant progress."—New York Sun.

Stinging Rebuke of Sectionalism.

Boston Special: Judge Aldrich, who presided in the first session of the superior court to-day, promptly discountenanced an appeal of counsel that the jury return a verdict for his clients because they were northern men. The case was that of John L. Byrne, of New Orleans, who sought to recover damages of the Massaoit Packing company of Massachusetts, for the alleged breach of an agreement in not delivering to the plaintiff 3,000 barrels of mackerel. In the course of the argument counsel for the defendants appealed to the jury to find for them, because the plaintiff was a southerner, and contended that to give him a verdict would be sending the northern capital to the south. Judge Aldrich, in closing his charge to the jury said:

"I make a single observation, gentlemen, upon this case. I am glad to know that here in Massachusetts justice is not determined by degrees of longitude or latitude. You are entire strangers to me, but I know you are a Massachusetts and a Boston jury, and from the time when a Boston jury acquitted British soldiers for shooting Boston citizens, because they were not held personally responsible, down to the present day, I think that Boston juries have continued to render verdicts according to the law and the evidence, without regard to the location of the plaintiff or the defendant. Massachusetts never repudiates. She pays the last dollar in gold if gold be worth 300 to one. Gentlemen, in this case I am sure you will render a verdict as if the controversy was between A and B, without regard to place of habitation, according to the law and the evidence given you, and upon no other consideration."

The jury returned a verdict for plaintiff of $7,813,75, the full sum claimed.

The Highest Building in New York.

Plans were filed with the Superintendent of Buildings in New York recently for the erection of the highest building in New York, and probably in this country, on the northwest corner of Fifty-seventh street and Seventh avenue. The proposed structure will be 150x94 feet in size, 200 feet high from the tower to the ground, and will be entirely fire-proof. It will be used as an apartment-house, and will accommodate thirty-eight families. There will be ten stories in the front of the building each fourteen feet high, and in the rear the space will be divided into fifteen mezzanine floors, each nine feet in hight. Four elevators will furnish an easy and rapid means of transportation. The architecture is a modification of the Franco-Italian style, to conform with the most approved modern ideas of light and ventilation. The vestibule of the main entrance will be very elaborately constructed of stone, carved and paneled. The cost will exceed $650,000, and it will take nearly two years to complete it. From the attic to the basement the height will be 171 feet, and the four families occupying the upper floor will have an extensive view of the surrounding city.—New York Times.

How President Taylor Prevented a Duel.

When Gen. Zachary Taylor was president, his son-in-law, Jefferson Davis of Mississippi, afterward a president himself was in the senate. At one particular time under this administration Colonel Bissel, afterward governor of Illinois, who had headed an Illinois regiment in the Mexican war, was in the house of representatives. One of Bissel's enemies took occasion to remark, in debate in the house one day, that in a certain battle on Mexican soil, Bissell's cowardice nearly lost the day to the American arms. "Nothing," he declared, "but the skill and bravery of Colonel Jefferson Davis of Mississippi, and his brave regiment prevented a disgraceful rout." Bissell jumped up promptly, and angrily denounced this statement as false. In fact, he said the case was just the other way—Colonel Davis's cowardice nearly lost the day. Colonel Davis's regiment lost its heart; Colonel Bissell's bravery saved the day. His regiment was only less brave than himself.

It does not appear from the story that came to me the other day that the representative to whom Colonel Bissell gave the lie cared to take it up. But Senator Jefferson Davis immediately sent Colonel Bissell a polite note inviting him to retreat or fight. The colonel replied that he preferred to fight, and, after the blood-thirsty manner of those days, named muskets, slugs and five paces as the terms. He expressly requested that the place and the hour be so arranged that the police could not possibly interfere. Senator Davis agreed with his antagonist as to the conditions, and the seconds were instructed accordingly. Colonel Bissell returned to the city and went to his rooms. There he found the president's private secretary with an invitation to come at once to the white house. Of course he went, and, as he had expected, found his challenger in the library with President Taylor. The latter said to Colonel Bissell that thinking it a pity that two such men should make war upon one another he had himself arrested Senator Davis, and had sent his private secretary to arrest Colonel Bissell. Now that he had them he proposed to keep them at least until after lunch, and as they were his guests they must also be friends. So they shook hands with more or less cordiality, and declared the duel off.

AARON BURR'S PISTOLS.

From the Louisville Courier-Journal.

Some weeks ago I ran across perhaps the most famous and fatal firearms on this continent—the superb duelling pistols of Aaron Burr. They are a bone-breaking brace of the first calibre, and the property of Captain Brent Hopkins of this city. One of these pistols fired the ball that killed Alexander Hamilton at Weehawken. It is identified by a long, deep notch indented on the handle. The pistols were made by Mortimer of London, England, and were imported by Burr at the close of the revolutionary war. The barrels are thirteen inches long and carry an ounce ball. They are flint locks, and the pans for the priming are lined with gold, and the toucholes are bushed with the same metal. They are hair triggers, and shoot with great force and accuracy. The locks are very superior and of exquisite mechanism. The pair came into the possession of Capt. Brent Hopkins, the present owner, through his uncle, Capt. Goode Hopkins of the Forty-second regiment of United States dragoons, who purchased them from Burr in Washington city in the winter of 1813 or 1814, paying $500 in gold for them. Burr remarked at the time that he would not let any one have the pistols, as he had used them with Hamilton.

The weapons have surely a blood-stained history. They have been used with fatal effect in eleven duels. Among the sanguinary combats, Pettis of Virginia killed Biddle on Bloody Island near St. Louis; Edward Towns of Virginia killed a Frenchman near New Orleans; Capt. Sam Goode Hopkins killed a Spanish Count near Madrid, Mo.; Hugh Brent killed a man from Georgia on Diamond Island, below Henderson, Ky. They were used several times in Virginia, twice in South Carolina, and more than once in Kentucky, with deadly effect, Robert Triplett of Owensboro shot the old lawyer Phil Thompson, of that city through and through with one of them, but strange to say, Thompson recovered and grew as fat as a bear. Henry Clay and Capt. Hopkins were fast friends, and the former was to have used the pistols in one of his duels, but they arrived a day too late.

HOUSE AND FARM.

For and About Women.

To cultivate and to commune in heart and soil with flowers elevate to a holier sympathy with all mankind, and lifts the affections to a higher level.

Paris ladies wear masses of flowers from their highest phrenological bump to the ends of their skirts.

A correspondent writes to the London Spectator—"We have heard a good deal, lately, about 'rational dress,' and we are promised one, if not two, exhibitions of it this year; but as everybody does not go to exhibitions, and as, moreover an exhibition is rather calculated to convey to ignorant minds the idea of something not intended for everyday use, I am anxious to suggest a method of propagating the new doctrines.

Lady bank officers are getting to be quite numerous. We have already noted the fact that a national bank at Marion, Iowa, and another at Raleigh, N. C., have lady Presidents, and now we learn that Mrs. M. H. Galloway is President of the Savings Bank at Fond du Lac, Wis., Sarah F. Dick, the Cashier of the First National, at Huntington, Ind.; Annie M. King, Cashier of a bank at White Cloud, Kan.; Jennie Combs, Cashier of a bank at Middleville, Mich., and Miss M. W. Bond, Treasurer of the savings bank at Florence, Mass.

Says a lady correspondent of the London Spectator: "There must be no half-measures, no compromising with vicious fashions. We are told that all shoes should have flat soles and broad toes; that all waists should be as guiltless of restaint as that of the Medician Venus; that sleeves should be roomy, skirts straight, and bonnets fit to protect the head effectually from sun and wind, and a great many other things which I, for one, should like to see exemplified, not only on the persons of young and pretty girls, who look well in anything, but on the more mature ladies, who have hitherto done the talking and writing, and who are, naturally, the persons to show the world the excellence of the new way."

The Business of Hop-Growing.

The high prices paid for hops during the last three years, and the extremely high price which has been paid the last season, have led some farmers to suppose that by raising hops they could soon become rich. This is certainly not a good impression, and if carried out there must be a crash in hop growing. There has not been a year since hops have been grown, prior to 1882, but that many of the old hop yards have been ploughed up. But last season it would have been almost impossible to find a man who had ploughed up a hop yard. At the same time the number being planted is very great. By this appearance of things it is evident that the number of acres of hops under cultivation in 1884 will be and must be nearly double what it has ever been heretofore. With such an increase in the acreage, certainly more hops will be produced than is required to supply the demand of the market, and the price must necessarily fall. Every one is aware of the uncertainty of the hop market, that the price one year is likely to be high, and the next year low. To make a correct prediction on the future hop market is almost as impossible as on the weather. But experience teaches us that when an occupation becomes extremely profitable every one will follow that occupation. When hops are high, all will raise hops, and by so doing the market will become so overrun that it is very difficult to dispose of hops, the price being almost nominal. Then comes a crash, farmers will plough up their hops and abandon the folly. This changes the whole system. Hop yards will be ploughed up, but not planted. The acreage will gradually decrease. The large surplus which has been accumulated becomes exhausted, and the price must rise again.

There are also other things which cause the market to fluctuate. A light crop generally commands a high price, and a heavy crop a low price. A heavy crop is generally followed by a light one, so that the market must have its ups and downs. At the present time the farmers of hop-growing districts are putting all their dependence on hop growing, while other crops are being slighted. That all cannot raise hops and do it profitably is certain; so look out for low prices and loss! Let farmers be prepared to fall back on some resource other than hop growing. When the price of hops fell in 1877, many farmers were left in a very bad way, having nothing but hops with which to meet their liabilities. If farmers would not crowd the market, they would do better. As long as the price is high they all plant. When it is low, they all plough up. If some of them would realize that it would be better to reverse this, they would have less hops when the price is low, and more when it is high.—J. F., in Country Gentleman.

Bran For Milch Cows.

It is well known that phosphorus is an essential ingredient in the formation of bone, and, indeed, that bones are the principal source of our supply of phosphorus. Wheat bran is rich in phosphoric acid. Wheat contains in the whole grain, 8.2 per cent. of phosphoric acid, and corn only 5 1-2 per cent; but nearly the whole of the phosphoric acid of the grain exists in the husks or bran. Thus, wheat bran contains nearly 29 per cent. of this valuable substance. What percentage is in the bran of corn we have no means of ascertaining, but it is certainly less rich in phosphoric acid than wheat bran. Rye bran is richer still than wheat bran, containing over 34 per cent. of phosphoric acid, which is a larger proportion than is contained in any other article of food for stock. Wheat bran is also far richer in lime than corn, and is therefore a better food for poultry than the latter. If wheat bran is preserved free from damp or mold it will not deteriorate in quality by keeping for any moderate length of time—a year, for instance. Our dairy farmers and stock raisers will see by this the value of brans for feeding purposes. —Prairie Farmer.

The Corn Crop of Knsas.

In Kansas the prospects of the next coming corn crop are promising. The deep freezing of the severe winter placed the soil in the best possible condition for plowing and planting. In some localities the lack of rain has been retarding the planting, but in most sections timely showers have left nothing to be desired. Nine-tenths of the acreage is now planted and in the southern portion of the state the plants are coming up nicely. The large acreage of last year has been added to very nearly 11 per cent. making the state area this year about 5,229,090 acres. Twenty-four per cent. of the crop of last year, it is estimated, is still in the hands of farmers, or 37,430,476 bushels—a larger amount than was ever raised in the state in any one year prior to 1873. Not nearly so large a proportion of the corn crop is sold in former years. Farmers are finding use for it at home. But little of the amount now on hand will be disposed of on the market; the greater portion of it will be fed where it was raised.

To Prepare Pie Plant.

Cut it in small pieces as for pie; put in a porcelain kettle with a little water in the bottom and until tender. Add sugar till it is sweet enough and simmer until only liquid enough remains to nicely cover the pie plant, then put boiling hot into glass jars and seal like any fruit.—[O. (2) Pare and cut into small pieces two pounds of rhubarb, add one and one-half pound of white sugar and the rind of a lemon cut fine. Mix these ingredients in a dish and let them stand till the next day, then strain off the juice and boil three-quarters of an hour; add the rhubarb and boil together one quarter of an hour;—[E. S. (3) Fill a glass can with raw pie plant cut in small pieces as for pies. Pour on cold water to fill the can and seal it up. This will keep the year round and make as nice pies as when freshly picked. Try it.

Wire Screens.

Wire screens in the windows and doors before the season has progressed very far save trouble. If flies once get into the house it is difficult to get rid of them. Then too, the screens keep out a good deal of dust. Before they are put in they should be carefully examined, dusted, and if necessary, painted. This may be easily done by almost any one. A can of green paint, costing perhaps 2 shillings, with a small brush, and a little turpentine to thin the paint if it should be too thick, is about all that is needed. First clean off the dust thoroughly with a duster and brush, a regular paint duster is the best, it is a fine bristle brush about the size and shape of a large round paint brush, used by painters to dust with before applyng paint or varnish; then lay the screen with the woodwork resting on a couple of barrels, if you have nothing else, and paint the wire carefully. The paint must be thin or it will fill up the meshes. If any is spattered on the frames it can be cleaned off with a piece of cloth wet with turpentine. Do this work in doors, if possible, as dust flying will settle into the paint while it is wet.

A Widow's Fine Gowns.

New York Letter in Washington Star.

Some dresses of extraordinary beauty were made recently for a widow of 30, who is about to enter the matrimonial state the second time. One was of irony satin with long plain train embroidered in a rich scroll pattern with pearl, white jet and heavy silk down the sides and round the bottom, which was edged with a narrow triple pleating lined interiorly with a double pleating of lace. The front was cut out in leaves, to a triple series, embroidered and laid over flounces of pompadour lace, the width diminishing toward the bodice which formed a very deep point, and the hollows of which upon the hips were filled in with embroidered leaves, below which were deep paniers of the lace. The bodice was cut square, embroidered in front, and surrounded with a standing fraise of exquisite lace. The sleeves were formed of a single puff of satin and double fall of lace, the lower one descending over the elbow.

Another dress was a very delicate combination of shrimp pink with a lovely brocade on a tinted ground. The bodice of this dress was cut in one with the train, which was trimmed with irregular falls of lace at the sides and softly puffed at the back. The entire front was covered with a net-work of pearl embroidery as light almost as lace and forming barred sections divided by twisted ropes of small seed pearls which cost as much in time and labor as jewels.

On the Flower Garden.

It is a poor plan to sow seed to transplant too early, before the weather has become settled and one is sure of plenty of warm rain and sunshine. Decide what flowers you want to have in your garden and arrange the beds with reference to them. It is a great mistake to try to have more than can be well cultivated. The practice of putting a dozen different kinds of plants in one bed, or setting several plants where there should be but one, should be avoided. Give every plant plenty of room and its growth and flowering capacity will be much greater. Arrange your garden with reference to color, size, and form so that the general effect will be harmonious. Select the places for different varieties of flowers in accordance with their especial wants. Certain kinds of plants need a cool, shaded spot, rich earth and a good deal of moisture, while others thrive best in a lighter soil, or where they can have the greatest heat. Take all these things into consideration, and study the habits of each plant, if you would be successful. Roses, carnations, gladioli, and pansie will bear to be set out earlier, and barsy climbers should have been pruned and trained before this time. Delicate seeds, however, require the most tender handling. They should not be planted till the soil be warm and dry, and can be made smooth and fine. Simply cover the seeds with earth; if they are buried deep, in nine cases out often, you will never see anything of them. The tiny shoots will be unable to force their way out of the ground.

If you are so unfortunate as to have a number of plants already started in a hotbed or cold frame be careful not to transplant them too soon. Use them first to the cold air by gradually uncovering them, and when they are transplanted give them plenty of room, and shade them for several days. It is hardly safe to do anything with seeds or hotbed plants before the very last of May or first of June.

Garmo of Springfield, O., writes: "I want every one to know that I was cured of dyspepsia, heartburn, sour stomach and other disagreeable symptoms of weak digestive organs, by using only one bottle of Dr. Guysott's Yellow Dock and Sarsaparilla. My stomach now readily digests any kind of food."

London's Wine Vaults.

London Letter in Boston Herald.

The wine vaults of London are not to be seen every day or by every person The other day I was fortunate enough to secure a "tasting order," and I, in company with one or two others, made a tour of the St. Katharine's and London Dock vaults. I saw over 5,000,000 packages of port and sherry, over 1,000,000 of of claret and 500,000 of spirits. They were in vast tuns, hogsheads, casks and barrels and the total amount in storage was 260,000,000 gallons. In fact, there were six and half gallons for every man, woman and child of the population of Great Britain. Some of it had been in store for years. The owners had forgotten about it and the old moldy casks had rotted away at their chines and had been several times replaced. One lot of 1,000 gallons of sherry had been in the vaults for nearly 50 years. It was brought from the south of Spain by its owner, who had fallen dead in the vaults. The wine, along with his other property, had passed into chancery, and the litigation, which had continued for nearly a century, is as far from being ended, apparently, as when it begun. But the wine has been growing old and valuable, and, if sold now, would probably bring five guineas a gallon.

Let me explain that these vaults are simply great cellars under the dock-houses. In area they aggregate some 35 acres. They extend under the Thames on one side, and well under Tower hill on the other. There are about 16 feet from floor to roof, and are by one means regular in form, but reach out in strange passages and alleys in all directions. They are bonded by the government, and owners can have their property in them as long as they like without paying customs duties.

A long, narrow flight of well-stone steps that have been in constant use since 1804, opened before our view, and at their foot were dim, twinkling lights that flickered fitfully, as if in a struggle to overcome the fumes of the wines that came up the stone channel like a breeze from a distillery. It was warm, rich with the odor of the wines, and musty and moldy, A sniff of it wasn't half bad, but you remember the fate of the Persian esthetic who had his choice of death. "To die amid sweet perfumes," he said. So they chucked him into a hogshead of ottar of roses and he expired in great agony. At the bottom of the flight of steps the guide met us, a tall, broad-shouldered ruddy cockney, who handed each a lard-oil lamp, fastened to a straight stick about 10 inches long. He began by asking us if any one was a teetotaller. None of us were. "Because," said he, "if you don't take a drop of something on your stomach you'll get screwed because of the smell." He drew a glass of sherry for each of us out of a big cask near the foot of the stairs. It was heavy, full-bodied wine; with a rich nutty flavor and an aftermath like leather smells. It had been hung in leather skins over one season, having been the last made and too late for the regular wine harvest, but it was good for all that and "very mellowin' to the horgans."

Turning then sharply to the left, the vaults spread out before us in vast underground acreage. Lights twinkled here and there, moldy men were engaged in moving the packages at some places, and down the long passage under the Thames the polished steel skids for riding a barrel stretched in narrowing perspective; till they joined apparently in one and flashed on under the line of lights above them.

Straw Lumber.

The other day we had occasion to investigate pretty thoroughly the character properties and uses for straw lumber. As some of our readers know, this is an article manufactured at the west, and turned out in boards or sheets thirty-three inches in width by twelve feet in length, and of various thicknesses. It is heavier than black walnut, has no grain, is of the color of straw-board, though considerably darker, and is much stronger and stiffer than ordinary timber. Though made in considerable quantities at the present time, the supply seems hardly equal to the demand. There are advantages in this material which in the near future will probably make it of the highest value, not only for carpenters and architects, but for the car-builder, and, in fact, for mechanics generally. Its toughness, the firmness with which it holds nails and screws, the ease with which it can be cut, and the fact that it can be bent by the aid of heat, shaped in dies, and is not liable to shrink and warp, and is little effected by water, even when unprotected, makes the range of its probable uses extraordinarily great. It seems to be a non-conductor of heat and electricity. It can be rolled up into pipes of great strength and light weight, and is available for a range of uses for pannelling purposes for which we have no equivalent.—The Iron Age.

The resignation of Lieutenant Colonel Guido Ilges, to take immediate effect, has been received at General Terry's headquarters. Colonel Ilges recently tendered his resignation to take effect January 1, 1884, but was notified by the secretary of war that, unless he amended his resignation as he has now done, he would be court-martialed for duplicating his accounts.

London paper reports that nobody except an intimate friend knows where Mr. Parnell lives in that city. On leaving the House of Commons he drives in a cab to Charing Cross and then walks toward the Strand. He is believed to live in one of the side streets off the Strand in company with Mr. O'Kelly.

Gen. Chamberlain, who is still in this city taking needed rest after the late surgical operation in which Dr. J. H. Warren relieved him of a dangerous malady, is now almost entirely recovered. He is able to enjoy the society of his family and to do a fair amount of reading and other mental work. The General states that he feels entirely cured and in better physical condition than for years. In a few weeks he will be able to leave Boston.

The Providence Journal tells the following crow story: "A few days since a man living in a town just over the Connecticut line went hunting for crows. He discovered a nest in a tall tree, and climbing up found therein eggs, which he secured, putting some in his pockets, but one he placed in his mouth, descending the tree very carefully lest he break his fragile store. He slipped, his jaws came together, and crushed the egg in his mouth, and, oh, horrible, it contained a very young crow. Report doth not say whether the man can eat crow or not, but it is safe to bet he does not hanker after it."

Perhaps the most striking incident in the generally smooth and quiet career of the late Jules Sandeau was his intimacy with George Sand, when he was twenty and she twenty-five. It was meant to be eternal; but it lasted less than two years. Thirty years later they met again, in the foyer of the Odeon. Their eyes met for a moment. He hesitated, half raised his hat, and then asked a friend who was by his side: "Who is that lady? It strikes me I have met her somewhere before."

Angelo Cornetti an Italian murderer who was hanged at White Plains, New York, last Friday, did not belong to the ordinary class of men condemned to death on the gallows, and at his execution provided an unusual sensation. Men in his position commonly go to the gallows with every appearance of willingness, professing the belief that the rope is a short and agreeable cut to glory. Cornetti made no such professions. He didn't want to "go to Jesus," and he was not only frank enough to say so, but he struggled most violently against being started on any such celestial journey. He made a desperate effort to break through the line of attendants, tried to fasten his teeth into the arms of the men who seized him, and died with howls of rage upon his lips.

While a great elevator was being built in Kingston, N. Y., a day or two ago, a remarkable exhibition of coolness and presence of mind was given by one of the workmen. He was standing on a scaffold about sixty feet high, when one of his companions thoughtlessly removed a stone at the foot of the structure. The whole thing gave away, and the workman was only saved from being dashed to the ground by seizing a projecting plank. While hanging suspended in the air he did not grow frantic and let go; he simply remarked to a friend below: "Jim, you'll find a ladder on the end of the wharf," and waited till the ladder was brought. Then he said he would take it as a personal favor if his fellow workman and companion would refrain from removing the foundations of the scaffolding again while he was up aloft.

Tree-Planting.

An appreciation of the civilizing power of trees is manifesting itself with more or less strength all over the country. The man or the woman who plants a shade tree, or shrubs or vines, merely for ornament, is unconsciously refining not only his or her own nature, but that of every neighbor. The tree or the plant in the ground, interest in its growth is at once awakened, and from that springs a regard for other matters, which are not at first sight practical, about the house. A man who has a few trees and shrubs to look after finds less time to spend in lounging about the village tavern or the country store which answers for an exchange and a club. The woman who has learned some of the secrets of nature by tending a little flower patch, will find greater pleasure among her roses and tulips than in the company of idle gossips. Recognizing the humanizing influence of arboriculture, educational authorities at the west have lately initiated a system for awakening an interest in the subject among the children of the public schools. In West Virginia tracts have been distributed, and it has been recommended that an acre for each school house be set aside, and that each child be allowed to plant a tree or a shrub which he may call his own. In Michigan the college in Olivet has a fine campus shaded with native trees, which has already had a wholesome effect upon the town. Rural improvement associations have been formed in many of the smaller towns at the west, and the result has been that lawns, shaded by thick-leaved elms, appear on what were once parched and glaring road ways.—Boston Transcript.

A NIGHT OF ADVENTURE.

It was a hot, weary morning at the far end of the London season. There were not very many carriages left in the park or on the streets; yet Zoe Conington, one of the greatest beauties in society, was driving down dusty Oxford street. And she was crying, quietly, beneath the parasol which she held well over her eyes. Presently the carriage turned up one of the substantial side streets, and stopped in front of a very neat and prosperous-looking house. The door was painted dark green, and on it was a brass plate, bearing this inscription: "Mr. Edgar's home for Trained Nurses." Mrs. Conington quickly left her carriage, rang the bell at the door, and was immediately admitted. She was shown into the "office," where she found Mr. Edger and his Lady Superintendent, both apparently very busy at large writing-tables.

"I want a nurse, Mr. Edgar," said Zoe Conington, rather helplessly. She knew her eyes were red, and she did not like the feeling.

"Certainly," said Mr. Edgar; "what sort of case?"

"It is for mp sister," said Zoe. "I really don't understand what's the matter. They say she has what you call anæmia, and the doctor who attends her fears she will not live long. I believe he is an old fogy, and does not understand the case."

"Then you want a nurse of experience?" said Mr. Edgar.

"Exactly," said Zoe eagerly; "and I should be so glad if I could have one that is ladylike as well—not a common hospital nurse. You see my sister is quite alone, without any lady friend; and I can't go to her because her husband doesn't like me."

"Nurse Harcourt," said Mr. Edgar to the Lady Superintendent, who nodded and rang a bell. "She is exactly what you want," he added, turning to Zoe. "She is an experienced and clever nurse, and she is a lady. We don't have many like her. She belongs to a good family. I feel sure you will like her. Come in, Miss Harcourt," as the nurse thus named entered.

"What is the case, sir?" said Nurse Harcourt.

"It is said to be anæmia."

"I can undertake that, I think, sir."

"Of course you can," put in the Lady Superintendent.

Zoe had quickly taken in the girl's appearance. She was slender, active, with an intelligent and interesting face. Her features were not good, yet there was a charm of color about her. She had large and very dark eyes, and strong dark eyebrows; while her thick hair, cut quite short, was all bright with warm gold and red. This certainly was not Zoe's idea of a common hospital nurse."

"I don't know whether I ought to say so," said she to the nurse, "but I don't think the doctor understands the case. Have you often nursed anæmia?"

"Yes; in the hospital," said Nurse Harcourt; "and I have had cases since in which it was present. I don't think I should be easily deceived in it."

"Then, you must have my address," said Zoe; "and write or telegraph me direct, as you think fit. If there is any mistake being made in the treatment, I will send down a physcian at once. Will you undertake this?"

"Yes," said Nurse Harcourt, with a quick, bright smile; "I think I can undertake that. Shall I get ready, sir?"

"What station?" asked Mr. Edgar, armed with an "A, B, C," and a magnificent glass.

"Lostayvil," said Zoe, "somewhere near Penzance; a wretched little river fishing place. People ought not to go so far away from everybody. Is there any chance of her getting there to-night?"

"Lostayvil—oh, yes; she can get there at ten o'clock. The train starts in half an hour. She must have some sandwiches made up to take with her," he said to the Lady Superintendent, who rose and hurried away pen in hand to give orders.

Mrs. Conington drove to a telegraph office, and sent a "wire" to her brother-in-law: "From Zoe Conington, Hyde Park Gate, to Edward Merton, the Old Fall Lostayvil—Your account of Agatha has alarmed me exceedingly. I am sending her a nurse, as I think it may be a comfort. She will arrive at the Lostayvil station about ten o'clock. If you cannot send for her, she will find some conveyance."

Nurse Harcourt dressed all in her gray, and with a gray veil over her bright hair and clever face, caught the express, and took her seat without any fuss or excitement, although she had only half an hour to get ready and reach the station in. When she arrived at Lostayvil it was a clear, sweet night; the station seemed to stand alone on a fragrant and indistinct desert, with no sign of any houses near.

"Is there anything come to fetch me from the Old Hall?" asked she, in her clear, determined young voice.

"Nothing at all, Miss," said the solitary porter; and then, after a second pause, during which he shouldered her box, "so I suppose you'll go to the hotel."

"No, indeed," said Ada, who immediately suspected him of being in the pay of that same hotel. "I must go to the Old Hall to-night. I suppose I can get something to drive in?"

"There's post-horses at the hotel," said the porter dubiously.

"Take me there, then," said Ada. It seemed to her that she walked about a mile and a half after him over a lonely road. At last they arrived at an inn entrance round which there were some signs of sleepy village life. After a stern interview with the dull landlord, Ada succeeded in getting him to have out a "po'shay" and two horses for her. A driver was extracted from the bar where he was drinking. He came out surly, and getting on the box after Ada and her luggage had been waiting some time in the "shay," began to whip the horses. This amusement he continued to indulge in until they arrived at the "Old Hall," taking the horses at a rapid gallop, up hill and down dale.

The Old Hall stood high, with a wide lawn about it, dotted by clumps of fine trees. On the way Ada was charmed by glimpses of the winding silver stream and the wooded hills about it. All was very lovely; yet something in the aspect of the Old Hall made her shiver as she approached it. It was very dark; only one window seemed dimly lit; the front door appeared to be hermetically sealed. But Ada courageously rang and knocked, and while she waited for an answer filled up the time by paying her surly driver the fabulous sum he demanded of her. At last the door moved; it opened slowly, and on the steps stood a tall man.

"Are you the nurse?"

"Yes," answered Ada.

The coachman whipped up his horses in the familiar style and rattled away. A servant who looked like a groom came out and lifted Ada's box into the hall. A lamp stood on a table there, and by its light Ada tried to discover what sort of a house she was in. She was standing in a big, old-fashioned hall or house-place. Opposite her, his hands deeply buried in his pockets, stood the man who was evidently master.

"I told the maid to get a room ready for you," he said. "The man shall light you up there, and you can see my wife in the morning. Shall he bring you some supper?"

"If you please," said Ada. "First I'll take off my hat, and if you will allow me I'll go to my patient at once."

"Nonsense!" said Mr. Mertoun; "you must sleep after a journey."

"But it is my duty to see her first, if you please, sir."

Ada followed the man-servant upstairs to a little bed room where he left her, saying he would bring her some supper. She washed her hands and combed out her hair. When he came back she said: "Shall I find Mr. Mertoun down stairs?"

"He is gone to his own room," said the groom, "and he says missus is asleep, and not to be disturbed."

"Which is her room?" asked Ada. "I must know, because I have come down to nurse her."

"I'll show you the door," said the man. He led a little way along a corridor, and pointed up a short staircase. "The door on the left," he said, and immediately hurried off, carrying his light with him.

"This is a queer house," thought Ada. However, she found her way back to her own room by the glimmer of light from its doorway. Then, taking her candle, she went straight to the door of the room the man had shown her. She knocked gently; there was no answer. So she quietly turned the handle and looked in. A solitary candle lit a large room; she could but dimly perceive that on the bed lay a woman who, seeing her, started up as if in terror, and then fell desperately back again. Evidently this was the sick room. Ada shut the door, put down her candle, and approached the bed.

"Don't be frightened," she said; "I am a nurse your sister sent me down to take care of you."

"I thought you were a spirit," said Agatha Mertoun; "I have had strange visions to-day." Then she relapsed into a silence, and seemed to forget Ada's presence. After awhile she spoke again. "I am dying," she said.

Ada went close to her and looked into her eyes. They were very strange. Suddenly the unhappy woman was seized with a violent sickness. Ada, with her quick wits, noticed some things which made her wonder. When her patient, weary and exhausted, lay back again on her pillow, she began to make a tour of the room. There were a great many bottles in different places. She took out all the corks and smelt at the contents. Suddenly, while thus engaged, she happened to look toward the bed, and met Agatha's eyes fixed upon her with a gaze of some extraordinary meaning or intelligence. It almost frightened even the brave Ada. She put down the bottle quickly and went to the bedside. But Agatha had closed her eyes, as if too weary to keep them open. Looking earnestly at her Nurse Harcourt realized how wonderfully beautiful she was, in spite of the deadly pallor which lay on her face. Suddenly the sickness came again; and then a violent spasm.

"This is a queer sort of anæmia," said Ada to herself; and after a long look at her patient, began to smell at the physic bottles. Just then she heard a faint sound at the door. Hastily approaching it and opening it she saw Mr. Mertoun disappearing through the opposite door. "He wanted to watch me," she thought. "What can this mean?" She locked the door inside and continued her investigations. Suddenly she came upon a bottle inside of a cupboard, nearly empty, the smell from which almost made her cry out. But she remembered her patient and refrained. She merely put the bottle in her pocket, and then, without hunting any more, went back to watch poor Agatha. The color of her face grew steadily worse, and her weakness was rapidly increasing.

"What on earth am I to do?" exclaimed Nurse Harcourt at last "in this out-of-the-way place? I can't see her die before my eyes. If I could only get the doctor!"

She had spoken out loud, thinking Agatha quite unconscious. But she was not. She opened her eyes and appeared to express something by their earnest gaze. It seemed as if she understood Ada's words.

"It's the only thing to be done, I believe," said Ada to herself; "and I'll do it." She took out her watch and looked at it—half-past three. Going to the window, she drew the curtain a little aside. There was a faint grey haze all over the world; but the light would be enough to find one's way by, and every moment brought the dawn nearer. "If I did but know the way," she thought. "Well, I must wake up some one and ask it."

Having made up her mind, she no longer hesitated. She took a final survey of her patient and then left the room. She locked the door on the outside, and took the key with her. Quickly entering her own room she caught up her gray cloak and traveling hat, and put them on as she hurried down stairs. "If I only knew where the servants sleep!" she thought; "but I'm so afraid of rousing Mr. Mertoun. I'll wake up some cottage people."

With some considerable difficulty she opened the front door, and then drew it close behind her without absolutely shutting it. To her delight she found it would stay so without moving; this would enable her to enter the house again quietly. As quickly as swift feet would carry her, she hurried out of the grounds. She saw no cottages; so she went on along the widest road, hoping to reach some habitation in time. To her delight she saw at last a hedger and ditcher trudging away to his work. She ran after him, and, almost breathless with her quick movement and excitement, caught him by the arm while she asked him her question.

"The doctor?" he replied. "Right on till the cross roads, then to the right; not mor'n a mile."

Not more than a mile! Nurse Harcourt started off on her way gleefully. That soon would be accomplished, she thought. Had she but known how strange is the Cornish mind on the subject of distances she might have stayed to ask further information. But, instead, she hurried away, leaving the working man to stare after her in complete and bewildered amazement. The cross-roads were reached before long, and then she turned to the right and hurried quickly along the lonely road.

At last Ada began to reflect that she must have walked a great deal more than a mile since her meeting with the hedger and ditcher. In fact she was beginning to feel a little puzzled and hopeless, for there was no sign of houses. Still she hurried on, hoping to meet some one else who would direct her. Suddenly on her ear fell the sound of laughter—high, clear, hearty laughter; but nevertheless the sound encouraged her. It came again and again, and guided her steps out of the high road into a wonderfully quiet lane. The laughter still went on ahead, like a mocking spirit, as a will-o'-the-wisy. But suddenly Ada found herself close to a little cottage, every window of which was brilliantly illuminated from within. The lower windows reached to the ground and stood open, exhibiting all the signs of a late revel. Empty decanters and bottles, innumerable glasses, some packs of cards on the floor—these things caught Ada's quick eye and made her wonder; while leaning on the gate of the cottage was an extremely handsome young man dressed in white flannels. He looked at Ada with the steady gaze of astonishment. He was immensely surprised at the sight of a young face in gray, with an extremely charming face, taking a walk at four o'clock on a misty morning. Without a second's hesitation she approached him.

"Can you tell me where I can find the doctor's house?" she said, "a man I met told me to come this way."

Her earnest tone seemed to rouse him and make him understand that she was out on business.

"Dr. Frere is the nearest resident doctor," he said, "and he lives about six miles off, over there," pointing the way Ada had come. "But if there is anything I can do, let me help you. I am a doctor."

"You?" said Ada, her gaze wandering from his sun-burned face, which had on it the unmistakable up-all-night expression, to his white flannel-clad figure, and then to the cottage beyond, which looked so absurd, in the growing daylight, with a quantity of dying candles burning on the table.

"It's all right," he said, seeming to understand her perplexity. "I'm Alan Browne, of Wimpole-st. I'm down here for the boating, and I've been having a bachelor party. Didn't you hear that fellow laughing as he went off just now? I had to get four of the others to take him away."

"I know your name," said Ada, earnestly. "Come with me. I am a nurse from Mr. Edgar's Home. I'm in charge of Mrs. Mertoun up at the Hall, and she's dying. If you don't come at once it may be too late."

"What's the matter with her?" said Dr. Browne. "I've got a pocket medicine case here; shall I bring it?"

Nurse Harcourt leaned on the gate and said something in a scarcely audible voice; then she took out the bottle from her pocket, and held it up for his inspection.

"Impossible!" he exclaimed.

"Come and save her," said Ada solemnly. Dr. Browne turned, hurried into the cottage, and in little more than a minute reappeared with a small case in his hand. Seeing him ready to follow her, Ada immediately started off as quickly as possible on her return road. Alan Browne hurried after her, leaving the little cottage, with all its windows open and its candles burning to show its disorder to any passer-by who might chance to wander that way.

"You are a very good walker," said Dr. Browne, when he had got up with her.

"I believe I am," said Ada, and went quickly on without any further remark.

These two, going swiftly through the pale, ghostlike morning mist, would have looked strange to any one who could have seen them. Both were very pale; Dr. Browne had got rather bored by his bachelor party, which had lasted too late for his taste; and then he had been somewhat startled by Ada and what she had said. Nurse Harcourt was white with excitement and fatigue, although she did not know it, nor know that she was weary. She was intent upon returning to her charge; she was full of anxiety as to what might have happened in her absence.

"You know," said Dr. Browne presently, "this thing can't be possible. She is a noted beauty; the men that stay in Lostayvil go to church to look at her. Who could do such a thing?"

"I can't say, sir," said Ada; "but I do not think I am mistaken."

Dr. Browne was so bewildered by the unwonted manner of her introduction to him that he forgot this vision of the morning was a nurse; but Ada remembered her position, and addressed him with the manner she used in sick rooms—quiet, but having in it an odd mixture of defiance and deference.

Very little more passed between them; they walked so quickly that it was not easy to talk. Dr. Browne covertly observed his companion very earnestly.

As they reached the gates of the Hall the stable clock struck five, and the gray mist was beginning to lift a little and glide away like the ghost of the dawn. It had been a strange walk, though neither thought of it at the time; but it had the effect of making them feel as if they had known each other for years. The house was not awake yet; all was just as Ada had left it! She gently pushed open the front door and led the way into the dark interior. Up the dark staircase the two crept like thieves. The blinds were all closed, and only a faint glimmer of light came in through the chinks here and there. As the gray figure and the white figure came noiselessly up the staircase, suddenly something started from the door of Mrs. Mertoun's room, and with a horrible cry rushed across the landing. It was the cry of a most awful fear. It made Ada feel sick, and she longed to sit down on the stairs, for her legs gave way beneath her. But she would not. She remembered her patient, and getting out the key of the room, opened the door and let Dr. Browne in; then she closed it behind them, and locked it. Agatha Mertoun lay rigid, like a lovely statue on the bed. Her eyes were staring and fixed on her lips was a foam. Nurse Harcourt looked at her with a sinking heart—was it too late? But she quickly threw aside her cloak and prepared to wait upon Dr. Browne, who soon became absorbed in his task. He used strong measures and watched their effect with anxiety. Nurse Harcourt saw with a curious sort of satisfaction, that he was acting upon the same idea with regard to the case which she had offered him. He did not reject it as impossible now. For two hours this fixed attention continued, neither left the bedside.

At last Dr. Browne went to the window, and beckoned Ada to him.

"The servants will be up now," he said; "ask them to get you some coffee. You look perfectly worn out."

"I believe I am rather tired," she said; "but I was right, wasn't I?"

"Quite right," he said; "and you have saved her life by your pluck."

Thus comforted, Ada went away in search of the servants. On the landing outside the door she found the man servant whom she had seen the night before. He was standing still, with a face full of perplexity.

"Nurse," he said, "I believe master's gone out of his mind. He has been queer for some time past, but not like this."

"What is it," asked Ada.

"He is sitting on his bed laughing; and every now and then he stops, and shrieks out suddenly that the house is full of gray and white ghosts. I don't like it—it's awful."

Then Ada remembered that cry of fear. "He must have seen me bring in Dr. Browne early this morning," she said; "he is in his boating flannels. Mrs. Mertoun was much worse in the night and I went for a doctor. Dr. Browne had better see your master."

The man looked a good deal bewildered, but recovered himself sufficiently to agree, and Dr. Browne heard his tale. While the servant was gone, he turned to Ada and began—"You know the house better than I do—perhaps you can tell me.—"

"Better than you do!" exclaimed Ada; "not much. I only got here last night at eleven."

"Last night at eleven!" repeated Dr. Browne. "Why, what a night of adventure you have had! No wonder you look worn out. Well, can you tell me who to send to, because there is evidently something very wrong here?"

"Yes, I can tell you that," she answered. "I have the address of Mrs. Mertoun's sister, who sent me down, and to whom I was to telegraph if necessary."

"That's all right," said Dr. Browne; "have you ordered any breakfast?"

"Not yet," she answered.

"I will send the man to see that it is got ready for you, and brought to your room. Now go straight to bed."

"Thank you, sir," said Ada, "but how can I leave Mrs. Mertoun?"

"I am not going away just yet; you know I did not travel from town yesterday. I will have her attended to; and you shall be called in four hours."

"Thank you, sir," said Ada again; and went away down the now sunlit staircase, on which her room opened.

"Thank you, sir," repeated Dr. Browne to himself. "What an extraordinary little woman it is! By Jove, it it has been a night of adventure."

Ada got into bed, drank some warm coffee, and then fell suddenly into a deep, dreamless sleep. It was the repose of complete weariness. Four hours later the maid knocked at her door. Ada started up broad awake in an instant, and as fresh as a flower. In a very short time she was dressed and at the door of her patient's room. The maid was in charge; Dr. Browne had left her with instructions what to do, and Mrs. Mertoun seemed to be a little better. Agatha was lying on a heap of pillows, looking very white, and wild and strange. But she was evidently in less suffering.

"My dear little nurse," she whispered when Ada bent over her, "I know you have saved my life. They will not tel me where my husband is, but you will. Is he mad?"

"I don't know anything," said Ada, "I been asleep all the time."

"He must be," she went on. I am sure he was not in his right mind or he would never have attempted what he did—you believe me, don't you? He loved me when he was himself; but sometimes he had awful fits of jealousy, when I thought before now he would try to kill me. It was in one of those fits that he brought me here; and it has been growing on him. When we were married I was thought a beauty; and he was always fancying I should get tired of him. Oh, nurse, I am sure he was not in his right mind. You will tell the doctor so, won't you?"

"Yes, yes, I will," said Ada, "and indeed I think so; I should have said so in any case. And the servants told me this morning that he was not in his right mind."

"Ah! then it will be all right," said Agatha, with a sigh of relief. Ada understood then that this beautiful woman still loved the husband who had attempted her life, and that her great dread was lest he should be held accountable for his attempted crime.

Late that night Zoe Conington arrived with her husband; they brought with them a "mental" attendant, who immediately took entire charge of Edward Mertoun. The dreadful thing which Ada had discovered and prevented was kept a secret among a few who knew of it.

Every day after Zoe arrived, Agatha insisted that her dear little nurse, as she always called Ada, should go out for a walk. The country around the old hall was exceedingly beautiful; to wander about in it was the keenest pleasure possible to the country-born girl. Zoe did all she could to make her happy; but she found that nothing pleased her so much as the fresh air and the wild flowers. But Zoe one day carried a great piece of gossip to her sick sister's sick room.

"My dear," she said, "I know now why Nurse Ada is so fond of the field. Dr. Browne meets her. They will be telling us they are engaged soon!"

And so they did, One day they came in together with a conscious look of guilt. Dr. Browne says that when he asked Ada a question, which girls reply to generally in either a sentimental or a scornful manner, Ada merely said:

"Thank you, sir."

Chipeta's Address to the Utes.

Translated by Bill Nye.

People of my tribe! The sorrowing widow of the dead Ouray speaks to you. She comes to you, not as the squaw of the dead chieftan, to rouse you to war and victory, but to weep with you over the loss of her people and the greed of the pale-face.

The fair Colorado over whose rocky mountains we have roamed and hunted in the olden time, is now overrun by the silver-plated senator and the soft-eyed dude.

We are driven to a small corner of the earth to die, while the oppressor digs gopher holes in the green grass and sells them to the speculator of the great cities toward the rising sun.

Through the long, cold winter my people have passed in want and cold, while the conqueror of the peaceful Ute has worn $250 night-shirts and filled his pale skin with pie.

Chipeta now addresses you as the weeping squaw of a great man whose bones will one day nourish the cucumber vine. Ouray now sleeps beneath the brown grass of the canyon, where the soft spring winds may stir the dead leaves, and the young coyote may come and monkey o'er his grave.

Ouray was ignorant in the ways of the pale face. He could not go to congress, for he was not a citizen of the United States. He had not taken out his second papers. He was a simple child of the forest, but he stuck to Chipeta. He loved Chipeta like a hired man. That is why the widowed squaw weeps over him.

A few more years and I shall join Ouray—my chief, Ouray, the big Injun from away up the gulch. His heart is open to me. Chipeta could trust him, even among the smiling maidens of her tribe. Ouray was true. There was no funny business in his nature. He loved not the garb of the pale face. But won my heart while he wore a saddle-blanket and a look of woe.

Chipeta looks to the north and the south, and all about her are the graves of her people. The refinement of the oppressor has come, with its divorce and schools and gin cocktails and flour bread and fall elections, and we linger here like a boil on the neck of a fat man.

Even while I talk to you the damp winds of April are sighing through my vertebræ, and I've got more pains in my back than a conservatory.

Weep with the widowed Chipeta. Bow your heads and howl, for our harps are hung on the willows and our wild goose is cooked.

Who will be left to mourn at Chipeta's grave? None but the starving papooses of my nation. We stand in the gray mist of spring like dead burdocks in the field of the honest farmer, and the chilly winds of the departing winter make us hump and gather like a burnt boot.

All we can do is to wail. We are the red-skinned wailers from Wailtown.

Colorado is no more the home of the Ute. It is the dwelling place of the bonanza Senator, who doesn't know the difference between the plan of salvation and the previous question.

Chipeta can not vote. Chipeta can not pay taxes to a great nation, but you will be apt to hear her gentle voice, and her mellow racket will fill the air till her tongue is cold and they tuck the buffalo robe about her and plant her by the side of her dead chieftain, where the south wind and the sage hen are singing.

Hon. F. A. Borer, Le Sueur, just returned from a visit to Creel City, (Devil's Lake) reports new buildings going up just as fast as timber can be got upon the ground. Already this spring between thirty and forty buildings, including a $6,000 hotel, have been completed, and as many more are in process of construction. Mr. Borer has about determined to make Creel City his future home.

SOLDIERS' SONGS.

From the Boston Traveler.

The war proved a very fruitful theme for the poetaster, and many a fledging bard delivered himself of more or less patriotic jingle which it would be quite unbecoming to rate under the name of poetry. Many war songs—and some of them are very good, too—were written for special purposes; to chronicle some particular event, or in praise of some individual regiment; and on this account they never became popular. But such as the "Battle Cry of Freedom," "Kingdom Coming," Marching Through Georgia," "When Johnny Comes Marching Home," "John Brown's Body," etc., achieved an universality that made them known from one end of the land to the other. The song of the soldier never sounds so well as when sung on the battle field. There it reaches to a height of sublimity obtainable nowhere else; and perhaps no finer volume of sound could be heard than Cromwell's round-heads, chanting the "Old Hundredth" after the battle of Marston Moor; a legion of Frenchmen" singing "The Marseillaies," or one of our own army corps pouring forth in unison "John Brown's Body."

It is safe to say that notwithstanding the great number of songs which the war of the rebellion was the means of bringing out, not one first-class lyric, not one single poem fit to be ranked with Thomas Campbell's immortal "Ye Mariners of England," was the result. Perhaps Mrs. Howe's "Battle Hymn of the Republic" is the most sublime of all the songs that were written during the rebellion, but this falls far short of Campbell's song. By the way, who is responsible for the air "Glory, Hallelujah?" Has it a father, or did it grow, like Topsey? The air is original with the words, "John Brown's body lies mouldering in the dust," but where it sprung from, who can tell? It followed hard upon another John Brown ditty, which we heard a crowd of boys and half-grown men singing while parading through the streets one night after the close of a meeting which was held at Faneuil Hall to lament over the execution of John Brown. The ditty, like the famous song of "The Black Snake," consisted of one hundred verses, all alike and this was its burden:

"Tell John Andrew,
Tell John Andrew,
Tell John Andrew
John Brown's dead."

From this sprang the now famous song which is perhaps the most popular of all the army songs, and of the many versions that have been made, the best is from the pen of Dr. W. Wetmore:

"See they come, from the mountain and the plain,
A noble band of patriots the Union to maintain,
And they never will return, till the country stands again
United firm and free.
Glory Hallelujah! etc.

Henry Clay Work, a Western bard, wrote and composed the music of several of the best songs, among which may be named "Marching Through Georgia," and that very capital and favorite song with the soldiers, "Kingdom Coming," which has an additional charm from being in the negro dialect.

"Say darkies, hab you seen de massa
Wid de muffstash on his face,
Go long de road some time dis mornin'
Like his goin' to leave de place?
He seen de smoke way up de ribber
Where de Lincum gunboats lay;
He took his hat and left berry sudden,
And I spose he's runned away!
De massa run, ha, ha!
De darkey stay, ho, ho!
It must be now de Kingdom comin',
An' de yar ob jubilo."

The air which accompanies these words is a very inspiring one, and it makes a capital quickstep. We call to mind an incident in connection with it. The army of the Potomac was on its march to intercept Lee, in his march through Pennsylvania. The Fifth corps then commanded by Meade, passed through the town of Culpepper, or Culpepper Court House, as it was then called. We were riding with Strong Vincent, afterwards killed at Gettysburg, who then commanded the Third brigade of the First division. When we came to the outskirts of the town—it was a place of some eight hundred inhabitants—Vincent ordered all the fifes and drums in the brigade to be massed, and with those in the front and with colors flying, we went through, the drums beating and the fifes tooting "Kingdom Coming," and "the boys" lending a ready chorus. We had got half way through the principal street—indeed, there was but one street—when suddenly the door of a dilapidated dwelling was thrown open and there appeared a solitary female, with the most vinegariah visage we ever beheld on a mortal. She looked at the troops for a moment, and then, quivering with rage and shaking her fingers, she screamed out at the top of her voice: "I welcome you with hospitable hands to bloody graves." A shout of derision was returned, and she disappeared as suddenly as she had appeared.

George F. Root, who was sometime a music teacher in this city is the author and composer of "Tramp, tramp, tramp,"

"In the prison cell I sit,
Thinking, mother dear, of you,
And our bright and happy home so far away,
And the tears they fill my eyes,
Spite of all that I can do,
Though I try to cheer my comrades and be gay.
Tramp, tramp, tramp, the boys are marching, etc.

"Yes, we'll rally round the flag, boys,
We'll rally once again,
Shouting the battle cry of freedom,
We will rally from the hillside,
We'll gather from the plain,
Shouting the battle cry of freedom!"

There is an adaptability to the air of this song which makes it available to many words. The soldiers were fond of setting the words of "Mary had a little lamb" to it, with ludicrous effect. As for instance:

"Mary had a little lamb,
It's fleece was white as snow.

Shouting the battle cry of freedom,
And every place that Mary went,
The lamb was sure to go,

and so on. During the terrible fighting in the Wilderness on the 6th of May, 1864, a brigade of the Ninth Corps, having broken the enemy's line by an assault, became exposed to a flank attack and was driven back in disorder with heavy loss. They retreated but a few hundred yards, however, reformed, and again confronted the enemy. Just then some gallant fellows in the ranks of the Forty-fifth Pennsylvania began to sing;

"We'll rally 'round the flag, boys,
Rally once again,
Shouting the battle cry of freedom."

The refrain was caught up instantly by the entire regiment and by the Thirty-sixth Massachusetts, next in line. There the grim ranks stood at bay in the deadly thicket. The air was filled with the crackle and smoke of burning underbrush, the pitiful cries of the wounded, the rattle of musketry, and the shouts of command; but above all, answering the exultant yells of the enemy, rose the inspiring chorus:

"The Union forever, hurrah, boys, hurrah,
Down with the traitor and up with the stars!
And we'll rally 'round the flag, boys,
Rally once again,
Shouting the battle cry of freedom."

One of the army songs, which has become as popular in England as it is in this country, is published as having been written and composed by Lewis Lambert. This is a nom de plume for P. S. Gilmore. To be sure the words do not amount to much, and there is something disagreeable to a well regulated temperance mind like our own in being obliged to melodiously inform the public that but the tune is of rolliching, devil-may-care order that is very catching. The fact is, Gilmore built up his words to suit his air, on the same principle that in Virginia they invariably build the chimney first, and then erect the house against it. The air was an inspiration, but the words might be classified as rhymes without reason.

"We'll all drink stone blind,
When Johnny comes marching home."

Poor Miles O'Rielley (Charles G. Halpine) set to the Irish air of "The Low Back Car" the words of the humorous song of which we here give the first verse, and we have heard him sing it with fine effect:

"Some tell us 'tis a burning shame
To make the naygurs fight;
An' that the thrade of being kilt,
Belongs but to the white;
But as for me, upon my soul!
So liberal are we here,
I'll let Sambo be murdered in place of myself
On every day in the year!
On every day in the year, boys,
And every hour in the day,
The right to be kilt I'll divide wid him,
An' divil a word I'll say."

Ah! poor Charley! He was the life of many a camp fire was private Miles O'Reilly, and much of the best and raciest literature of the war came from his gifted pen.

"The Star Spangled Banner" will ever rank as the first of American war songs, and linked with it will be "Hail, Columbia," "America," and the "Red, White and Blue." We are not certain that this latter is an American song. It has been claimed by the English under the title "Britannia, the gem of the Ocean." The first person we ever heard sing it was the late Edward L. Davenport, and he once informed us that he got the song in the mother land. "Hail Columbia," was set by its author, Judge Hopkinson, to the air of "The President's March," which somebody had composed in honor of Washington; but the words of "The Star Spangled Banner" are sung to an old English bacchanalian air, "To Anacreon in heaven," while the Rev. Mr. Smith's "My Country 'tis of Thee," goes to the air of "God save the Queen." The national hymn, with appropriate original music, is yet to be written. Keller's hymn does not fill the bill, nor indeed does Julius Eichberg's, or that ambitious production which Gilmore gave to the country two or three years since.

We have touched but lightly on a few of the soldiers' songs. Did one go into the matter to any great extent there certainly would not be a sufficiency of space in this edition of the Traveller to accommodate us. While there was plenty of enduring poetry written during the war, the number of really meritorious songs that were given birth to were few indeed. On the whole, we are inclined to think that in this respect the South was in advance of us, for we certainly (Mrs. Howe's noble efforts aside) do not possess a single song of the Rebellion at all comparable to "Maryland, My Maryland," and the air to which it is sung is well fitted to the words.

How the Dead Followed the King.

From the News and Queries.

In 1871 I was at Naples when an Italian corvette, the Amirale Caracciolo, was launched at Castellamare. The vessel was christened by the Countess Teresa Caracciolo, the daughter of the chief of the elder branch of the Caracciolo. I was staying at Naples as the guest of the young lady's father, and I heard from him a very remarkable story connected with the death of the very unfortunate officer in honor of whose memory the vessel was named. The circumstances which led to the execution of Prince Francesco Caracciolo in 1799 are well known. I shall merely state, therefore, that he was condemned by a court-martial composed of Sicilian officers to be hanged at the yard-arm of the flag-ship for bearing arms against his lawful sovereign. When the official communication of the finding and the sentence of the court was brought to the prince, he was explaining the names and use of the various parts of the rigging to some young Neapolitan noblemen who happened to be on board the ship. A glance at the letter was sufficient to show him its contents. He showed no sign of emotion, but requested the officer who brought him the dispatch to wait for a few minutes while he finished his explanations. This being done he retired to his cabin; and after a vain attempt to get the sentence changed to a more honorable manner of death, he resigned himself to his fate, which he met with great fortitude.

Some days after the event the king, who had been for an afternoon's cruise on a Sicilian ship of war outside the bay was returning to Naples in the evening. It was a moonlight night, and the sea was perfectly calm. There was, indeed, so little wind that it was difficult to steer the vessel. The king was sitting in the balcony of the stern cabin, watching the sea, when suddenly he became aware that something was following the ship. As the object came near it was easy to distinguish that it was the body of a man in the upright attitude, as if treading water; and very soon the king was able to recognize the features of Admiral Caracciolo. His eyes were open and seemed to be fixed on the king, and, except for its ghastly pallor, the face was unchanged. The explanation was simple. After being submerged for some days the body had become so buoyant that the weights attached to the feet were not sufficiently heavy to keep it under water; but they retained it in an upright position, and it was drawn along by the current created by the movement of the ship. It is easy to imagine the horror of Ferdinand at what he believed to be an apparition from another world. When at length it was explained to him what had happened he gave orders that a boat should be lowered and that the corpse should be brought on board, and taken to Naples for Christian burial. But the superstitious Sicilians dared not obey the royal command, and the ship, drawing in its wake the upright body of the admiral, sailed slowly into the bay of Naples. Here, a boat's crew was obtained from an English man-of-war, who took the admiral's body ashore, where it was deposited in his own palace, and at length received the last rites of the church.

A different version of the story is given in Southey's "Life of Nelson." I have here related the traditional account preserved in the family of the admiral exactly as it was told me by its chief.

TROUBLE BORROWERS.

There's many a trouble
Would break like a bubble,
And the waters of Lethe depart,
Did we not rehearse it,
And tenderly nurse it,
And give it a permanent place in our heart.

There's many a sorrow
Would vanish to-morrow,
Were we but willing to furnish the wings;
So, sadly intruding
And quietly brooding,
It hatched out all sorts of horrible things.

How welcome the seeming
Of looks that are beaming,
Whether one's wealthy or whether one's poor!
Eyes bright as a berry,
Cheeks red as a cherry,
The groan and the curse and the heartache can cure.

Resolve to be merry,
All worry to ferry
Across the famed waters that bid us forget,
And no longer fearful,
But be happy and cheerful,
We feel that life has much that's worth living for yet.

ROMANCE OF THE HOTEL STAR.

I.

The muddy voiture drawn by the lazy horse clattered over the cobbled pavement of the village, and I, seated therein, took in such details of the prospect as were unobscured by the broad round shoulders of my charioteer; to my right a sheer precipice of some 200 feet in height, crowned with shocks of ruddy foliage; to my left a bare landscape that but a month ago had been rich with golden grain; overhead a steel-blue sky dappled with shifting clouds. The long avenue of fir and poplar stretched before me in wearisome monotony of green and russet, and the road was moist with rotting leaves.

Three miles of muddy road, three miles of monotonous firs and poplars, an hour of shake and jingle of the crazy vehicle, and we rolled into the village of Pastal. The round-shouldered driver checked the lazy horse at the portals of the Hotel of the Star, a huge whitewashed edifice, its walls pierced by innumerable windows, and surmounted by unglazed attics, which stared blindly at the dreary fields beyond the swollen stream, turgid with late rains. There were half a dozen iron-topped tables and as many chairs and benches, all in a state of clammy perspiration, under the damp awning above the windows of the salon. At one of the windows there was a face, which flushed and paled as I descended from the carriage, and as I entered the public room the same face met me at the door. Not an unhandsome face, if judged by the standards of form and color, but one which expressed irresolution and moral shiftiness, if face ever did yet.

"Business," I replied; "important business."

"Indeed! With whom?"

The question was superfluous, as his shifting glance and irresolute voice would have told any onlooker.

"With you," I answered. He looked at me swiftly, and lowered his eyes again. "We can talk here, I suppose."

"Yes," he said sullenly enough. "There isn't a soul in the house who understands English. Hasn't been for the last fortnight."

He drew a chair to the fireless stove, and sat chafing his hands in evident discomfort. I took a seat at some little distance.

"How's Mary?" he asked presently, without looking up.

"Well in health."

He was silent again for a minute, and then broke out querulously:

"Can't you say something to a fellow? What's the matter?"

"I have come with the intention of saying something; and you ought to know what the matter is. Why have you not written?"

"I have written."

"She received your last letter a month ago."

He uttered an inarticulate growl by way of answer, and I repeated my question.

"What is there to write about in a hole like this?"

"Walter, my lad," I answered quietly, ignoring the puerility of his excuse and the insolence of his tone, "it won't do."

"What won't do?"

"Your conduct. And you must alter it. I have come here at some personal inconvenience, and if I am to be of any use at all, you must behave frankly. Now, what's the matter? Some new entanglement, I suppose?"

"By Jove, sir, it's not my fault—upon my soul, it's not. I like Mary a thousand times better than I—than I like her. But she won't take 'No' for an answer. What's a poor devil to do with a woman like that?"

"Have you ever given her 'No' for an answer?"

He answered nothing, but sat moodily staring at the fire.

"Will you ever have an ounce of pluck or a shred of common honesty?"

He growled again, and shifted his feet uneasily.

"Who is she? What is her name?"

"Madame Malines," answered Walter.

"Malines? I know the name. Have I ever met her?"

"Everybody knows the name. She's the widow of Malines, the French academician, the dictionary fellow."

"Indeed! But he was an old man, surely. How old is she?"

"Twenty-eight or thirty, I suppose."

"Where did you meet her?"

"Here, about six weeks ago, and she made a dead set at me—confound her!—the moment she set eyes on me. I'm the unluckiest beggar that ever lived, I think."

"What do you mean by 'made a dead set at you'?"

"Why, monopolized me, and hunted me about, wherever I went."

"She is in the hotel at present?"

"She will be soon. She's gone for a drive."

"Well," I asked presently, "what are your intentions?"

"Gordon, I don't know; I can't tell." He rose and began an irregular walk about the room. "I can't understand things at all, myself, or her, when she's away. I care nothing for her; I hate her!" he broke out, with a sudden febrile vehemence. "She makes me behave like a hound. I should have been back in England a month ago if it had not been for her. But I can't go. What would be the good? She knows all about me and would be on my track by the next boat."

"Have you told her of your engagement?"

"No," he answered, with shifty eyes; "I dared not."

"What do you mean by 'dared not'?"

He looked at me quickly.

"Wait till you see her and then ask that."

His cowardice respecting the woman of whom he spoke had put one suspicion into my mind which I did not hesitate to express plainly.

"Your connection is, at least, blameless?"

"Entirely. I swear it, Gordon, on my soul."

I had cleared a little ground for my operations, and began forthwith.

"If you were free, if your engagement with Mary did not exist, what would be your feelings toward Madame Malines?"

"As they are now."

"What are they now?"

"Fear of her when she is present; dislike when she is away."

"I have one more question to ask, Walter; I implore you to answer it truthfully. What are your feelings toward Mary?"

"I love her—I never knew how much until I met Madame Malines."

The early winter evening had closed so thickly about us that I could not see his face; but judging by his voice, which had for a moment lost its irresolute character, I believed him. We were silent for some little time, and in our silence the singing of the river came up distinctly from below. A clumsy Flamande, one of the servants of the hotel, entered and clamped about the room, lighting the lamps affixed to the walls. She went out, and, turning my eyes to my companion's face, I saw upon it the intent look of one who listens eagerly. I listened too. Clear through the rhythmic cadence of the swollen stream came the beat of horses' hoofs and the softened roll of carriage wheels on dead leaves, and, with a sudden shock of sound, horses and wheels struck upon the cobble-stones of the Place Publique, and fell into silence at the door of the Hotel of the Star. I looked inquiringly at my companion. "Madame Malines?"

"Madame Malines."

II.

Almost as he spoke her name the lady entered the room and came toward us; a woman of resolute carriage, though short in stature and slight in build. Her head was perhaps a little disproportionately large, and the expression of the face was decidedly rather masculine than feminine. The forehead was high and broad, the nose large, the lips full, the chin firm, the cheeks a little thin, but colored by the ruddy glow of health and recent contact with the weather. But her most remarkable feature was her eyes. Without being of extraordinary size, they were yet large, and of a depth and brilliance surpassing those of any it has ever been my fortune to see set in a human head.

She came straight toward me, without bestowing so much as a glance upon Walter, who stood awkwardly regarding us, and held out to me a tiny gloved hand, which I took a little clumsily.

"Good evening, Mr. Gordon!"

"Good evening, Madame Malines!"

She laughed a little at my prompt reply.

"The bore of an introduction avoided for once. My guess was right—as it usually is. You are Walter's friend. Will you be mine, I wonder?"

"Yes, I think so."

She turned to my companion. "Walter, Mr. Gordon and I have business to talk about. We will see you at dinner."

He accepted his dismissal without a word, and went away, leaving us together in the dimly lighted salon.

"Mr. Gordon," said Madame Malines, when we were alone, "whether your appearance here will be a circumstance for me to remember with pleasure in the future, the future must show for itself. For the present I am glad of it."

"Thank you, Madame Malines."

She waved her hand a little impatiently.

"We have much to talk of, and little time to do it in. I am glad of your appearance here, because you can be of use to me in resolving certain doubts of mine, and for no other reason in the world."

I waited for her next utterance, having handed her a chair. She waved me to another. I drew it toward her and seated myself.

"Mr. Gordon, if any understanding—no matter of what kind, friendly or otherwise—is to be established between us, we must be frank one with another. You are a man of business?"

"I am."

"I am a woman of business. I have certain questions to ask. Will you answer them?"

"If I can do so without any breach of confidence—frankly and fully."

"How long have you known Walter?"

"All his life."

"Intimately?"

"Yes—most intimately."

"What is your opinion of him?"

I stammered something—what, I scarcely knew at the time.

"Would you like to know my opinion of him?"

"I answered awkwardly that I should be pleased to hear any communication with which she might honor me.

"I despise him!" she said calmly.

The speech amazed me, and I showed my amazement in my face. She laughed a short hard laugh of doubtful meaning, and went on:

"My opinion of men in the abstract is not high. My opinion of such men as it has been my lot to know is lower still. If my judgment has been warped by unfortunate circumstances, that is my loss. You shall judge, Mr. Gordon, if you will. I will tell you the story of my life."

She was silent for a minute, looking past me with distended eyes.

"I was an only child, and I never knew my parents. My mother died in giving me birth; my father followed six months after. My only relative, an uncle, was unmarried, and he sent me to the Convent des Petits Oiseaux at Treilles. There I remained until I was seventeen years of age, poorly fed, poorly clad, and badly taught, or, to tell the truth, not taught at all; growing up amid universal neglect and despite. I often wonder now, looking back at that dreary time, that I lived through it, and I oftener still I wish that I had not. At seventeen I was taken from the convent to be married to my late husband, M. Malines. I can remember with what feelings I received the news of my approaching release. I was going to exchange a prison for a paradise, a loveless existence for one sanctified by love. I believed men loved their wives then, Mr. Gordon; I was only seventeen. That was my first disillusion. The world remembers my late husband with reverence as a scholar and a man of genius; his wife remembers him with loathing, as a cruel and niggardly tyrant. By marrying him I exchanged one prison for another; the neglect of many for whom I had no feeling for the neglect of one whom I strove to love and honor, but who repelled me with a cold suspicion. At the convent I had been despised for my poverty; in the world I was received with fulsome flattery, the meed of my high position and my husband's wealth. I wore jewels duchesses envied, drove horses which were the admiration of Paris, lived on the Boulevard des Italiens, and at the grand hotels of Nice and Baden; and I went to bed in the dark to save the expense of a candle, and spent the greater part of my mean allowance of pocket money in supplementing my meager meals served on solid silver by half a dozen flunkeys."

She spoke of these sordid details of her married life with perfect calm of voice and manner, with only the slow-burning fire in her eyes to speak the passionate contempt she felt.

"I had at hand the remedy which other women in my then position often take. I have been told that I have more than the common share of beauty often enough to believe it; and such love as the brainless gandins who throng Parisian drawing rooms have to give, such love as our novelists write of so flowingly, I might have had. I might have seen the initials of my name filled up with asterisks in the Carnet d'un Mondain, in company with the names of counts and barons in plenty. Will you believe me, Mr. Gordon—I find it difficult to believe myself sometimes, remembering that time—that I was true to my husband in word, and deed, and thought?"

There was no capacity of vulgar crime in the soul which found expression in her eyes, and I believed her. She went on with her story calmly still.

"The uncle of whom I have spoken was rich. I had been taught so well, by him and others, that a creature in my friendless condition should be only too thankful for any help at all, that the idea that some part of his riches might have been used for the softening of my hard lot at the convent never crossed my mind. I was grateful for the care which had found me even so mean an asylum from the actual hunger and nakedness which would, I was taught to believe, have been my portion but for my uncle. Well, Mr. Gordon, I learned by his death-bed confession, when the cowardice which he, and the priest who attended him, called repentance, forced him to confess the wrong he had done me, that my parents had been rich, and that their wealth was mine, and that he had robbed me of it. That, so far, Mr. Gordon, has been my experience of men; my only kinsman, the brother of my dead father, robbed me of my childhood; my husband robbed me of my youth; and now, when a woman's life should be just beginning, mine is ended.

"We are such fools, we women," she went on, with a self-scorn very terrible to see, "that to the end of the chapter, let us be deceived as we may, we must love and hope for love. I know your errand here. I can guess pretty fairly the means you will use to fulfill it. You will pay me the doubtful compliment of saying that your friend is unworthy of me. You cannot know that better than I. It is emblematic of my whole life that I should fix my love upon a creature whom I despise. It is more emblematic still that the shadow of happiness I seek in him should be denied me. I have told you I despise him; I do; but I love him, too. Oh, Mr. Gordon, think what that means and have some pity for me."

The emotion with which she made this appeal—an emotion which touched me deeply—had faded from her face and voice before she spoke again, although the pause was but a short one.

"I have already learned to know sorrow and disappointment so well, and have learned, too, to appreciate at their true value those illusions which happier people have but to believe to convert into realities, that no sorrow or disappointment that life may have in store for me can hurt me much. There can be no question between such a one as I and any creature who has yet to learn what life means. This girl—Walter's fiancee—you know her, too?"

"I have known her all her life. I am her guardian."

"She loves him?"

"Dearly."

"And he?"

I hesitated in my reply. Madame Malines smiled bitterly.

"You are delicate, Mr. Gordon, without cause. He does not love me. He would marry me perhaps; but not from love. You may speak freely."

"I think," I answered, "that he loves her as well as such a nature can love anything. It is an unfortunate business, Madame Malines. I hardly know which to pity most, you or her."

"You are unfavorable to the match?"

"Yes; I have done all that was possible to prevent it."

"Don't look at things too gloomily, Mr. Gordon," said my companion. "A good woman may do wonders—a good woman may reform Walter. He will follow any leader. Let her lead him in the right direction."

Five minutes before I had been vainly seeking for some word of comfort for the woman who now spoke, comforting me.

"Of one thing, at least, you may be sure; you need fear nothing from me."

She rose and struck a gong upon the chimney-piece, and then hurriedly traced a few words upon a sheet of paper.

"Tell Adele to pack everything, and forward to that address." There was not a tremor in the hand which extended the paper. "Order my carriage at once. I shall be ready in ten minutes."

She left the room without another word. Presently I heard the roll of wheels and tramp of hoofs again, and the red carriage lamp glared through the mist outside. I walked to the door. Madame Malines, her face thickly veiled, gave me one swift pressure of the hand; the carriage lurched and rattled away, and as the wheels left the stones and struck upon the soundless leaves beyond, a hand fell upon my shoulder. I turned and saw Walter beside me.

"Who was that?" he asked with a nod in the direction of the lessening sound.

"Madame Malines!"

III.

"The next train for Luxembourg, monsieur? To-morrow morning at 6 o'clock."

The official bustled away, the horn sounded, and the train which had deposited us upon the platform of the little station of Pastal steamed slowly away.

"Your luggage, messieurs?" inquired a bloused and flat-capped porter, bearing upon the arm with which he pointed a brass plate, on which was inscribed "Hotel de l'Etoile."

"Yes."

"The messieurs go to the hotel?"

"I am not sure," I answered. "Walter, one moment. We will be back directly, Mary."

I led Walter aside, and as I looked at him I saw that the trouble in my face was reflected in his own.

"Is there any other hotel in the place?"

"No."

His face was white, and he pulled at his moustache with an uneasy hand.

"Then there is no choice," I said. "We must go to the Etoile."

"You may go," he answered. "I won't. I'd rather spend the night in the fields."

I was angry at his cowardice, and showed it.

"It is five years since we were here—since we met Madame Malines. Of all unlikely things in the world, it is the least likely that she will be here. And even if she is, we may avoid her. You surely have no fear of yourself at this time of day. Be a man. We must find a shelter for Mary, and you must go with us."

He yielded to my arguments, and we mounted to the ramshackle carriage, the very same as had borne me, that day five years ago, to my first and last interview with Madame Malines. Changes had come about since then. Walter and Mary were married, and happier together than I ever dared to hope. We were on our fourth yearly excursion to the continent in each other's company, and had discovered, when too late, that the only route from Brussels to Luxembourg lay through Pastal. Walter had been so discomfited by the discovery that he had been aroused Mary's anxiety, and explanation was impossible, as we had long since made a compact never to mention the name of Madame Malines in her presence. We proceeded in almost unbroken silence to the hotel. As we entered the salon I could not help glancing hurriedly at the place where the remarkable woman who had dwelt so much in my thoughts had last stood in my presence. The room was empty, save for the hotel servant, who came forward to welcome us.

It was close upon the hour of dinner, and after a short retirement to our separate chambers to clear away the stains of travel, we returned to the salon, to find that meal in progress. The guests were of the ordinary type of the habitues of Belgian summer resorts—respectable native tradesmen from Mechlin and Brussels and Namur, with their wives and children, with a sprinkling of Germans, French and English, whose warring tongues created a veritable Babel. At the conclusion of dinner the majority of the guests betook themselves to a neighboring room, to listen to the strains of a piano, presided at by a young Englishwoman, and to lounge and chat and flirt, after the immemorial custom of miscellaneous assortments of humanity in general. The hotel garden, seen through the glass doors of the salle-a-manger which opened on to it, looked peculiarly cool and refreshing after the sultry heat of the day; and, ordering a cup of coffee and a cigar, I went thither, and took my seat at a little iron-topped table, hidden behind a bosquet of rhododendrons and myrtle.

The moon, low down in the violet of the evening sky, was at the full; the air was still as death, and an occasional muffled note from the little wood which clothed the swelling rise of the hill, whose thick-growing clumps of leafage were gilded by the evening beam, was all that broke the brooding silence of the summer night. The fireflies wheeled and dashed and darted in the myrtle leaves about me; and overhead, the stars shone out with deepening lustre in the infinite depths of the firmament. It was a time and place for peaceful dreams, and my thoughts were happy. But suddenly, half dozing in my deep content, my ear caught a rustle of the boughs near at hand, and, as I turned, a form glided into the moonlight before me and a voice fell on my ear.

"Bon soir, Mr. Gordon."

I sprang to my feet, half doubting my waking state. The voice laughed.

"You have forgotten me, then, and your memory is no better than other people's?"

"Madame Malines?"

"The same. Are you glad or sorry to meet me, Mr. Gordon?"

I did not answer the query in my trouble, and she laughed again.

Troubled as I was by her sudden apparition, I thought I detected something in her laugh which was not all bitterness or self-mockery, though it was principally prompted by those sorrowful emotions. I was about to appeal to her, when she spoke again.

"You need have no fear of me, Mr. Gordon. I will not harm the pretty pair; I saw them with you when you came, and avoided you till I found this chance of speaking to you alone."

She took a seat beside me and went on calmly:

"They are happy, and my own sorrows have taught me at least this much—that happiness is so rare a thing, and lasts so short a time, that it should be left to live out its own brief life. Trouble will come to them, as to all, soon enough. You need not think that any act of mine will hasten it. They are happy, I hope?"

"They are happier," I answered, "than, in the old days, I ever dared to hope."

"When do you go?" she asked suddenly, after a minute's silence.

"By the first train to-morrow morning," I answered.

"So soon? Then, will you promise me one thing, Mr. Gordon?"

"Certainly."

"I have something to show you. Will you come to my sitting-room and see it? No, not now," she said, as I half rose; "to-morrow morning, before you start. Do not think it will be too early; I shall be waiting for you. You promise? Very many thanks."

I promised, wondering what this might mean; and she went away as quietly as she had come, after giving me the number of her room. Her hand, as it touched mine in parting, was like ice.

When I went within my face betrayed that something unexpected had happened, I suppose, for both Walter and Mary questioned me as to my disturbed appearance. I put them off with some commonplace reply, and soon retired to bed, but not to sleep, passing the night in thinking of the strange hazard which had again thrown me in the path of this strange woman.

Early in the morning I rose and performed my toilet, looking forward to the coming interview with feelings of doubt and wonder. What could it be that she had to show me? I asked myself over and over again. At last, weary of asking and finding no answer, I left my room and passed along the corridor leading to the chamber in which my rendezvous was appointed. The door stood half open. I knocked lightly, and received no answer, though I repeated the summons some three or four times. I entered, and looked about me. Through the half-closed shutters fell one broad band of golden light upon the floor. The place was empty. There was a faint, sickly perfume in the air, which assuredly was not born of any of the flowers whose petals trembled in the morning light. Stay; what was that? It lay back, shrouded in shadow, on a sofa in the farthest corner of the room. Scarce daring to recognize the fear which filled my heart, I advanced toward it. A mass of waving black hair lay on the pillow and streamed about the white face, whose moveless eyes stared through the tangled locks. I drew the frail covering aside, and saw—Madame Malines.

SMILES AND TEARS.

Blest is the man whose font of tears
Is not dried up with lapse of years:
Blest is he, too, whose smiles can flow
As they once flowed long years ago.
He has not lost the gracious art
Of sympathy for others' smart,
He has not lost the charming grace
Which views the world with smiling face.
For as the poets oft have said,
"From the same source, or fountain head,
Both smiles and tears together flow,
To heighten mirth, or temper woe."

HOUSE CLEANING TIME.

Now comes the terrible, soul-trying time
When muttered murmurs thro' dismantled homes
Fill the wide welkin of this weary world
From room to room, thro' soft air of spring,
The busy bustle now begins to boom,
And saucy servants now submit
To orders which the heartless housewives give.
Speech answers speech, and thro' th' affrightened air
Each worker sees the other's dust-flecked face.
Husbands object in language most profane,
Piercing the day's dull ear; while from floors
The kneeling knights, who tempt the treach'rous tack,
With busy hammers take the carpets up,
Giving dreadful note of preparation.

HOME AND HOUSEHOLD.

How to Make Ideal Tea.

Having been fortunate enough to secure a pound or two of pure, fragrant, unadulterated tea, we must see that it is kept in an air-tight canister. If it be not so kept the tea will lose its crispness and flavor by absorbing moisture to some extent from the surrounding atmosphere, and by yielding up its volatile oil. The tea kettle should be kept scrupulously clean, both inside and out. We cannot expect to make good tea from water boiled in a kettle that is barked inside with lime or other deposit, and outside with soot. A dirty kettle proves the servant to be a slut, and darkly hints at carelessness in the mistress. The water should be soft. There is nothing to beat rain water that has been kept under ground in large tanks. The water should be filtered. The fire over which a tea-kettle boils ought to be as free from smoke as possible, otherwise it is not impossible that the water may partake of the flavor of peat or burning coals and the tea be spoiled. Before the water has come to the boil the teapot should be well warmed and the tea put in. It may then stand for a short time on the hob until the water boils, when the tea should at once be made. We heat the teapot in order to conserve all the caloric in the boiling water. We make the tea as soon as the water comes to the boil, because good tea can only be made with freshly-boiling water, not boiling water that has been boiled before or has been kept boiling too long. Boiled water is flat because it is non-aerated—that is the "why and the wherefore." Servants want to be drilled to this, or their heads drilled and the truth rammed into them. A worse fault than even this is making tea with water that has gone off the boil, which servants often do. Carbonate of soda should never be used to draw the tea. It is a mistake to add fresh tea to that which has already been made by way of getting stronger, and yet we constantly hear the remark made, "Put a little more tea in the pot." If more tea or stronger tea is wanted, it ought to be made in another teapot, and a spare one often comes in handy. A teapot ought to contain enough tea to go all round the company once at least; the habit of half filling all the cups, then adding boiling water and completing the work, is objectionable, not to say stingy. Urns may be used, and some of them look very nice on the table; but water should be boiling and the urn itself must previously have been well dusted.

What is the best kind of teapot? There is a difference of opinion about this. For our part we like the old-fashioned brown earthenware one, provided it holds enough. Next comes the silver teapot, which some prefer. White china teapots are also good. But in whatever teapot the tea is made, it ought to be clean and pretty new; an old teapot gets bad in the enamel, or lined with deposit. An old clay pipe, perhaps, but a new teapot. How long should tea draw? From three minutes to seven, according to the kind of tea and the character of the water. Invalids and people with delicate stomachs (and everybody else, for that matter) ought to be most careful to obtain tea of superior excellence and quite free from facing and adulteration, and ought to attend rigidly to the plan of making a cup of good tea which we have just been endeavoring to explain. The invalid should never on any account drink green or scented tea. The tea he is to drink, after having been infused for the proper time, say about five minutes, should be poured off the leaves into a well-heated, clean teapot, and served in that, covered by the cozy, if there be one about.

Domestic Economy.

There is one domain the almost exclusive right to which has never been denied to women. Nearly every house in America has its housekeeper, and that housekeeper is, in nearly every instance, a women. The comfort and welfare of the greater portion of mankind depend upon the mistress of the house, and yet how few girls are properly instructed in the careful keeping of a house! The cost of living, the amount of the "running expenses" of a household, depend mainly upon the woman at the head of the house. It would seem to be self-evident that no knowledge of natural laws or of scientific principles can be amiss in the head of such an important person; she needs to bear in mind certain rules of economy, such as no spend no more than she has a right to spend, and to obtain the maximum of utility with the money spent; in common parlance, to get her money's worth. This applies not only to purchases of articles of food and clothing, but to the care of them. A loaf of bread allowed to mold is so much capital wasted, so much loss to the country, for the possibility of muscular or mental power which was in it is thrown away and forever lost. The use of sal soda done up in packages with a fine name and costing some 25 cents a pound, instead of using it under its own name and paying 25 cents for ten pounds, is a waste of good money which might be spent in newspapers or in books. In these matters the housekeeper of to-day is at a disadvantage, as compared with the matron of fifty years ago. Then the soap was made from the ashes and grease which otherwise would be wasted; its composition and properties were known. Most of the wash material of which the every-day clothing was made was home spun and home dyed. The mistress knew how the colors were fixed, and consequently she knew what would injure them. Our grandmothers had a great deal more really scientific knowledge and skill than we are apt to give them credit for. Pioneer life is a good educator in practical things. Now the conditions of living have grown easier, and a loss of skill and of interest in the homely but all-important details of daily life has resulted. To a cursory observer it would seem as if housekeeping to-day was a very simple matter. Everything can be bought ready made, from bread to underwear, and surely the duty of mistress of a modern family is only to spend the money to what seems to be the best advantage. Science has opened so many new fields and made so many new discoveries that surely we are much better off than our predecessors were. Now, it is true that applied science has aided modern living in many ways, but if we examine closely we shall find that while we have sewing machines and electric lights, we have no new alkali for soap-making, no royal road through washing day, no indestructible fabric for clothing, no patent for managing servants; on the other hand, all the advance has only complicated the work of the housekeeper and left her more helpless than grandmother was. The manufacturers of articles of daily consumption do not hesitate to avail themselves of the chemist's art to adulterate and to substitute worthless ingredients, and the matron has not the knowledge to detect this fraud, and hence the whole household suffers. The only remedy would seem to be a better knowledge, on the housekeeper's part, of the nature of the substances in daily use and a better understanding of the rules of domestic economy. The average woman looks upon chemistry as an occult science, still closely connected with the alchemy of the middle ages. She seems to regard chemical operations as capable of transforming substances in quite as marvelous a manner as was claimed possible by the old-time searchers for the philosopher's stone; as a result she is a fit subject for the modern alchemist, the man who can turn sal soda or whiting into gold by a few neatly turned phrases, calculated to impress the public with the wonderful advance of modern science. To one who happens to be both a chemist and a housekeeper the evidence of the need of enlightenment on the side of the buyer has become so strong that silence seems no longer possible.

Rice and Beans.

Hall's Journal of Health: Half the people of the world live almost exclusively on rice. It contains 88 per cent of nutriment, while roast beef contains but 26. There are countries where the almost exclusive diet of the masses is beans. These contain 87 per cent of nutriment. The best and cheapest food for the dense populations of Asiatic countries, therefore, is rice; and since, from the general poverty of the people, varieties of food are out of the question, bounteous nature has given them most freely that kind which is among the most nutritious of all foods. With the rest of the world, rice is more of a side dish, and is served most frequently in the form of a pudding. We venture to affirm that when the cost, the percentage of nutriment, and the wholesomeness of beans are considered, there is not in the world a single article of food that can compare with them. There is no other vegetable food that answers so well as a substitute for meats. While they have so much to recommend them in other respects, they have no rival in point of economy. A quart of beans, costing 10 cents, will furnish a family of five persons with food for a day. Much of the value of beans as food depends on the manner of cooking. It would be difficult to cook them too much. They should be first boiled until soft, and then put in a baking-dish and baked until they are brown. A little salt pork or butter, but not enough to make them taste greasy, should be put in the baking-pan and cooked with them. If beans are not thoroughly cooked, they are difficult of digestion; still there is not a hotel or restaurant in a thousand that serves them sufficiently cooked, and, as a rule, it is not well to call for them in such places; but at home, when prepared under the supervision of a good cook, they make a dish that is wholesome and palatable.

Home Comforts and Decorations.

For upper rooms now cretonne curtains have rather replaced those of muslin and scrim, and in country houses hangings throughout are frequently of this material. In luxurious houses, where expense is not much considered, self-colored draperies of most delicate tone are in fashion, which are free from all design. In one room, for example, all the hangings may be of light rose tint, in another of delicate blue, simply tied up with ribbons to correspond, the drapery of bed, windows, and often of walls, being en suite. In some instances insertions of lace are introduced into these self-colored fabrics, but, if so, they run across and not down the material. Last year decorators attempted to shorten the inartistic length of windows by the introduction of margins above the curtains, in many instances obtaining this result by the use of stained or colored glass as a margin, the curtain being suspended just below it, but this style has not become usual from the fact that in the majority of newly-built houses the interior decoration has rendered it impossible. In large houses where more variety is possible, many of the best rooms have the advantage of this margin, and in such cases it is easy to produce artistic results, and to break the monotonous line of long drapery, but where, as above said, it is not possible to do this, cream-colored and tinted draperies reign supreme.

Portieres of all materials are found in the modern home. In very few cases the heavy materials which have excluded draughts in winter are replaced by those of lighter make, more suitable for the coming weather, but as a general thing they are either dispensed with altogether or left as they are. The latest novelties in these hangings are striped goods, the stripes running across the material and enriched by the introduction of gold and silver thread on either side of the stripe; and such can be obtained at very reasonable prices from 75 cents a yard upward. It is unnecessary to dilate upon the wide field that drapery opens for the home decorator. Embroidered hangings are always suitable and needlework can be used upon material of every kind. Simple designs are the best for working upon the fabrics, and it is better to avoid conventional patterns for this purpose and select a continuous design, or at least one which can be indefinitely repeated, as for example, stars and crescents, which can be worked in shaded silks, or, to suit a prevailing taste, in silver thread. Borders are not so fashionable for summer curtains as they are for those of heavy material, in which recently the margin has been very deep, the design being entirely confined to it and the side bordering, while the body of the hanging is of one color.

Lace curtains, of which we have said nothing, are of course always fashionable if they are really handsome. Some most beautiful designs are to be seen in the leading furnishers' to-day, but, as a rule, they are suitable only for very large and handsome rooms. Sets for three or four windows are woven in different designs, illustrating historic or legendary events, and are often exceedingly handsome. Less costly ones of Nottingham and antique laces are often decorated in needlework, the designs being outlined in colored silks and figures worked in raised stitch. Light silk curtains are also in fashion, either plain or with small patterns, or embroidered by hand. As a matter of fact, no attention bestowed upon windows is thrown away; they ought to be the most important features of the house—so much depends upon them, so much of the health, the pleasure and the happiness of every inmate of the home. The right way to consider them would really be to look upon them as pictures to be framed in such a way that accessories should interfere as little as possible with their intention and scope.

A novel decoration is being introduced in fashionable drawing rooms, vestibules and conservatories. It is the trunk of a small tree, five or six feet in height, with branches of flowering or other shrubs emerging from the top, replenished when necessary, and kept fresh by a long tin tube inside the tree. The trunk is, of course, hollow, and is fitted into a sort of ornamental base, composed of cork or pieces of wood. Sometimes small holes are cut, a tube fitted in and a fern planted. In the spring sprays of wild cherry, crab, laburnum, lilac, etc., would be correct, and in the late autumn our winter evergreens.

A Young Girl's Bedroom.

A young girl's room may be furnished daintily and in exquisite taste at a small expense. The chief outlay will be for a bedstead. This cannot be constructed out of a pine board and bit of muslin, though many other things may be; but a handsome painted beadstead of blue and white is the first requirement for this room. The floor may be covered with plain white matting, or of blue and white plaid, with a soft rug at the side of the bed: a dressing-case of white wood, covered with white silesia and muslin, can be made next, and a white wood washstand is also needed. This, like the dressing table, should have the under part entirely concealed by breadths of the silesia and muslin. They should be gathered slightly at the top, so that they will fall in graceful folds. The curtains should be of the muslin, draped, and the bed-spread and pillow covers of the muslin over silesia also. The bed-spread should of course lie smoothly over the bed, and be tucked in at the end and sides, unlike the lace ones, which hang over. The muslin of the pillow covers may be shirred at the top and bottom, if you like the full look the shirring gives; they need, in this case, no edges, and in fact when put over the silesia plainly, do not trim them with lace, unless you add this adornment to the curtains, but finish with a plain hem. With the various trifling ornaments a young girl gathers about her, the room will receive anything it may need in color to brighten it. A room so prettily furnished may be a real help to a girl; it will not be easy for her to cultivate disorderly habits there, for the effect she has worked to create would be entirely marred. It may help her to calm thoughts, but of this we cannot be certain.

The Bang of the Period.

The present fancy of coiffure arrangement is to a certain extent more elevated, although ladies to whom the low Grecian knot is becoming have not—and it is to be hoped will not—abandon that graceful style of hair-dressing. With a slender face this style seems to lengthen the contour, while the loose, graceful coils brought high up on the head tend to detract somewhat from this otherwise elongated appearance. But, whichever style is adopted, the stiff, flat effects produced by wearing bang nets or using bandolines is carefully avoided. To ladies with very dark hair many frizzes and crimps are unbecoming, and the brunettes at present usually arrange the front hair in a few careless rings or waves. Very little false hair is used, and any one who possesses a knot as large as any ordinary-sized door knob according to the present fancy needs no false hair, but unfortunates who can sustain but a still more scanty growth must have this slight deficiency supplied by art. So a variety of "pieces" designed to cover the desert spots sometimes existing on the top of a young or elderly matron's head are seen. One broad, straight piece arranged in loose rings high up on the forehead seems to be quite popular at present. Young ladies with light blonde hair have a fashion of frizzing the bang and then let it fly, which is very unbecoming and in many instances gives the damsel thus adorned an untidy appearance. Barbers say they do not make the bang as heavy as formerly, but they are by no means abandoned, although the tendency is to show more of the forehead. When the hair is coiled high on the head, several little short, loose curls are added just at the nape of the neck. These are particularly becoming to blondes.

A Waste-Paper Basket.

Choose a well made basket, and one that stands squarely on the bottom. One way to ornament the basket is to trim it with three bands of ribbon, of different colors; on the upper band embroider a vine of something green, with ox-eyed daisies to brighten it; where the ends join, cover them wi[illegible]h a large and handsome bow. If inclined to [illegible] take so much trouble, line the basket and fi[illegible]ish the upper edge with a puff of sat[illegible] or of heavy silk. A handsome basket [illegible]ay be lined with cashmere, with a ruching around the top, and hanging over the edge have a sort of lambrequin, made of strips of red and white cashmere, rounded at the bottom and pinked on the edge, and completed by having a bouquet of flowers in applique or in Kensington embroidery. A tassel on the bottom of each piece is a good addition; the pieces keep their shape better with a tassel. Another pretty way is to put a band of canvas, either drab, blue or scarlet, around the basket; below this put a band of black velvet; brighten both by embroidery; one design to work on the velvet is a procession of Kate Greenaway children. A handsome ribbon bow adds to the good effect.

Kitchen Keramics.

Any one who is familiar with the manner in which asparagus is cultivated will take all necessary care to wash it well before cooking. Not less than two or three waters are needed; do not drain the last water off, but take the asparagus out of it. A favorite way to cook it is to boil in salted water until it is tender, leaving the stalks whole; then lay three or four of them on slices of toast and pour milk or cream, seasoned with pepper and a little butter, over them. A safe way to determine if each stalk is tender before cooking is to break, not cut, a little piece off; if woody and tough it will not break easily.

Here is an excellent recipe for a water ice to be served in glasses: One cup of loaf sugar with the juice of six lemons squeezed over it, half a pint of water, and a syrup made by boiling three-quarters of a pound of sugar in a little less than a pint of water; let this stand in a large earthen jar or dish for an hour and a half, then mix the lemon, etc., with it, strain it and freeze. If you wish to make this a pretty dish, as well as pleasing to the taste add the whites of eggs beaten to a froth with powdered sugar mixed with them; put this on the top of each glass.

Salmon steak is delicious cooked in this way: Boil in salted water for twenty-five minutes, putting the slices of fish in when the water is hot. While it is boiling mix a tablespoonful of butter and the same quantity of flour together, then pour boiling water over it, beat it until light, and turn it over the fish when that is on the platter and ready for the table. The water must be literally boiling, or the flour will have a raw taste. Use pepper and salt and chopped parsley in the dressing to suit the taste.

If so inclined, you may decorate the top of a lemon pie in a fanciful style. Reserve one-third of the frosting, spread the rest smoothly over the pie; make a cornucopia of stiff white writing paper, but do not fasten either end; put the frosting in this, and, squeezing it out, ornament the pie. This is a happy device for birthday dinners, as by using with it a certain amount of imagination, initials and a date can be formed. For this purpose make the frosting thicker with sugar, so that it will harden without spreading out of shape.

The plain salad dressing which is so often announced on bills of fare, is the ordinary salad dressing, minus all sugar; one may learn to like it, if it is made with care, but to one who is not an epicure and deeply interested in getting a new sensation, the dressing with sugar will doubtless be preferable.

Oatmeal pancakes are good for breakfast, and may occasionally take the place of the oatmeal and milk so universally served at that meal. Make them with sour milk, with soda to sweeten it. The batter should be stiff. The oatmeal, unless it is ground very fine, should be soaked in water all night.

Lettuce, boiled, makes a good side-dish. Cook and serve as you do spinach. A small piece of bacon boiled with it is a good seasoning. When the lettuce has grown a little rank and is not quite crisp enough to serve as salad, it may be prepared in this way, and make an agreeable and wholesome dish.

Spiced beef, which is delicious cold and sliced thin, is easily prepared. Choose a piece with less fat than you would wish to have in a roast; boil this until tender in water in which you have put salt, pepper, celery seed and clover; the amount to depend on your taste.

A delicate pudding sauce is made of one egg beaten with one cup of sugar. This may be done some time before dinner; when it is time to serve the sauce pour over the sugar and egg half a cupful of boiling water; flavor with lemon or rose.

Stuffing for a baked fish should be made of fine bread crumbs, highly seasoned with pepper, salt and sage. One or two raw eggs beaten in with it also gives flavor to it. A little butter is needed if the fish is not too oily.

If the principal bones are removed from baked fish before it is sent to the table, it can be carved in an irreproachable manner with perfect ease.

Fables of Fashion.

Fine cotton fabrics are likely to be highly fashionable throughout the summer. The popularity of prints, sateens, lawns and muslins is to be very great. This sounds very like economy, but the impression that materials that cost so little a yard invariably tend to reduce expenditure is a fallacy of which last year gave many a convincing proof. Ladies who live in cities find in the end that a washing dress, with lace trimmings of Torchon, or Medici even, is about the most expensive investment they can make, costing really more than silk, since the laundress charges such an extravagant sum every time she lays her renovating hand upon it. White India muslin will also be much worn for evening dress at the watering places, the trimming being a mass of lace and embroidery, and white or tinted satin ribbons. Lace flounces and muslins also look well when placed over thin tinted materials, such as batiste. The tone given by these transparent fabrics is more delicate than with silk.

Handsome toilets of strawberry-colored Ottoman silk are shown, with flounces edged with wide crossway bands of darkest plum-colored velvet, the flounces being put on with several rows of drooping puffs. The back draping is a blending of the two materials: the sides have panels of the velvet, and the graceful Babet coat opens over an embroidered waistcoat, also of the velvet.

Burnished gold, mandarin yellow, and the creamy shade of raw silk are the tints in yellow more favored this season than that of old gold or copper color, so fashionable last year; while sage green has given way to a peculiar leaden-green known as porphyry; and cadet blue is replaced by nemophilae—the color of that flower.

Large Roman pearls, tinted with pale mauve, light blue, a delicate pink, and green blending with a sheen of silver or gold, are just now more in vogue than the smaller beads, the former not being so easily imitated in cheaper makes, and their price, which is considerable, insuring them against becoming common.

Pale yellow and bright gold are the colors triumphant even in floral garniture. The gaudy sunflower has sunk into oblivion, but is replaced by primroses, cow-slips, marigolds, kingcups, Narcissus and marshmallows.

Silk jerseys, gloves in strawberry red, pale yellow, nun's gray, and black will be more in vogue this summer than kid gloves of any sort.

In French importations of costumes the polonaise reappears once and again in varied forms, and with endless styles of drapery and garniture.

The Chinese driving cloak with sabot sleeves has taken the place this year of the French redingote.

Silk worm green is announced as the latest tint in that shade.

Washingtonian Relics.

In 1878, by a special act of congress, the government purchased from G. W. Lewis and family of this city a number of the household effects of George Washington, which have never been placed on exhibition. Mrs. Lewis was an adopted daughter of President Washington and wife of Maj. Lawrence Lewis, his nephew. Since these relics were purchased they have been stowed away in the basement of the United States Patent office, whence they have recently been transferred to the Smithsonian institute. The original number of articles has been somewhat reduced by curiosity seekers. When the transfer and lists were compared, quite a number of relics were missing. The following is a list of the articles turned over to the authorities of the Smithsonian: One large mirror, one dozen parlor chairs, antique pattern, two arm chairs, one easy chair in which Washington sat a few minutes before he died, one double brass candlestick which held the candle by which the farewell address was written, two silver-plated candlesticks, one large and two small plated waiters, one field glass used in the revolutionary war, one plated cake basket, one large mahogany box in which silverware was kept, a portrait of Washington, the robe in which the child Washington was christened, a half dozen silver-plated salt cellar, one shaving glass and frame, eight blue glass rings, one glass goblet, two glass tumblers, three wine glasses, four champagne glasses, one glass finger bowl, five lamp chimneys, one glass decanter, five vases, one toilet bottle, one teacup and saucer, one box inlaid with pearl, three preserve dishes, portraits of George and Martha Washington, and several articles of table crockery.

BEFORE AND AFTER.

I.

"Did I step on your train?"
"Nay, dearest, no matter!"
"My pet brown again—
Did I step on the train?"
"You wanted, 'tis plain,
An excuse, sir, to flatter."
"Did I step on your train?"
"Nay, my dearest! what matter?"

II.

"Your foot's on my gown"—
"Well, it doesn't much matter!"
"You vandal! you clown!
"Your foot's on my gown—
"Such an ugly dull brown—
"Tisn't worth all this chatter!"
"Your foot's on my gown!"
"Well, what does it matter?"

TOT'S TROUT.

O beautiful trout with the crimson dot:
My grasshopper waits for you:
I know that you're hiding below that root,
And to reach you I'll wet my shoe.
I've borrowed a line from brother Ben,
A hook from Cousin True,
And I've hurried away from my kitten and doll,
To pay a visit to you.

I s[illegible] you yesterday under the boat
With [illegible] the polka dots on your side.
Your c[illegible]ve green mantle shaded with black,
And yo[illegible]r fins spread out so wide.
You were [illegible]al mean to go away so soon
When I ju[illegible]t put in my hands;
I only wanted [illegible]o smooth your back,
And tell you [illegible]bout the land.

We've got the lova[illegible]liest violets here,
Pansies and jacob[illegible]ins,
Scarlet runners all r[illegible]med with white,
That will exactly ma[illegible]h your fins;
And just the dearest go[illegible]n bugs,
Some of them dusted w[illegible]h blue;
So, now, little troutie, just [illegible]to my hook,
And then I'll show them t[illegible] you.

I'll show you the nest the wre[illegible] has made
In a hole in the linden tree,
With two of the cunningest little [illegible]ggs,
And nobody knows it but me.
I'll show you my dolly and all of her clothes,
My kitten and Bennie's big dog,
The place where the bumble bees go in [illegible]he barn,
And the moss on the old hollow log.

Come, beautiful trout with the pearly side,
My grasshopper's getting all wet,
Bennie is calling and I must go home,
Or dolly will worry and fret.
Now, come, little troutie—O no, not so hard!
You are pulling me into the stream;
And you've taken the grasshoppers off from my hook;
I just think you are real mean.

HOME—BEAUTY.

"Mine be a cot," for the hours of play,
Of the kind that is built by Miss Greenaway,
Where the walls are low, and the roofs are red,
And the birds are gay in the trees o'erhead;
And the dear little figures, in frocks and frills,
Go roaming about at their own sweet wills,
And play with the pups, and reprove the calves,
And do naught in the world (but work) by halves,
From "Hunt the Slipper" and "Riddle-me-ree"
To watching the cat in the apple tree.

O Art of the Household! Men may prate
Of their ways "intense" and Italianate;
They may soar on their wings of sense, and float
To the au dela and the dim remote;
Till the last sun sinks in the last-lit West,
'Tis the Art at the Door that will please the best;
Till the end of Time 'twill be still the same,
For the Earth first laughed when the children came!

FOR THE LITTLE FOLKS.

Gretchen's Birthday.

Gretchen is a little German girl. She has hair as soft as silk, and eyes as blue as the sky and as round as saucers. She has a fat little nose, and a tiny red mouth, which has such an odd way of opening to say "Yes, yes," when you ask her a question, it makes you laugh to see it.

Hans is Gretchen's brother. He is two years older than she, and is quite a little man. His face looks like the round moon. When he laughs, which he does very often, up go his fat little cheeks so that you can scarcely see his eyes.

Hans loves Gretchen dearly. He would do anything in the world to please her. One day, just a week before Gretchen was six years old, Hans asked his mother for money.

"What do you want it for, my son?" said she.

"I want to buy a present for Gretchen's birthday."

"You are a good brother! I am sorry I cannot give it to you. I work hard all day to earn food and clothing for my dear children, and have no money to spare for presents."

Hans felt badly, and wished he could earn something. But he was only a little boy, and did not know how to go to work.

Gretchen's birthday came at last. Hans had not a penny in his pocket. When he started for school in the morning, and bent his fat face to kiss his sister good-bye, he felt sad to think she must go without a present.

Gretchen put her chubby arms about her brother's neck and laughed as merrily as ever. Had she not Hans, and the good mother, and the sky, and the grass, and the flowers? She had all these things to make her glad. What matter if she had no gifts.

On his way home from school Hans was in luck. A man asked him to hold his horse. Hans did hold him, good and strong, for more than half an hour. When the man came back he put a bright piece of silver into the boy's hand. Such a doll as that silver bought! It was a beauty.

Gretchen was so glad when she saw the doll! Hans was so happy when he gave it! The good mother was so pleased to see the children love each other so dearly! I think there never was a happier birthday.

Putting Wolves to Death by Torture.

Lieutenant Schwatka's Siberia: One use of the whalebone to which the Esquimaux put it, and one case of which came under my personal observation, I must not allow to pass unnoticed. Whenever wolves have been unusually predatory, have destroyed a favorite dog or so, or dug up a cache of reindeer meat just when it was needed, or in any way have aroused the ire of the Innuit hunter, he takes a strip of whalebone about the size of those used in corsets, wraps it up into a compact helical mass like a watch spring, having previously sharpened both ends, then ties it together with reindeer sinew, and plasters it with a compound of blood and grease, which is allowed to freeze, and forms a binding cement sufficiently strong to hold the sinew string at every second or third turn. This, with a lot of similar looking baits of meat and blubber, is scattered over the snow or ground, and the hungry wolf devours it along with the others, and when it is thawed out by the warmth of his stomach it elongates and has the well-known effect of whalebone on the system, but having the military advantage of interior lines its effects are more rapid, killing the poor wolf, with the most horrible agonies, in a couple of days.

Mary Anderson's Love.

Gath: Before we got on the train I observed at Cincinnati a tall, rather handsome woman of the blonde character, and evidently a Kentucky lady, come to the train accompanied by a large-bearded, phlegmatic person. These people I had seen sitting together at the dramatic festival, and supposed them to be a newly married couple. The train left Cincinnati at an early hour in the morning, yet these two were down to see Mary Anderson off. When they parted the lady kissed Miss Anderson, and then said that she must give a kiss for "him," meaning, I supposed, the phlegmatic man aforesaid. Miss Anderson allowed the kiss to be given, but without any other recognition of the man, and quietly resumed her seat. I inquired of an actress in the car who those people might be. My acquaintance said: "The man is very rich. He is in business in New Orleans. He is dead in love with Mary Anderson and wants to marry her. Fine-looking as he is, she does not give him any encouragement. The lady is his sister, who is doing the best she can to forward the match."

Called Jo Cook a Dude.

Rev. Joseph Cook of Boston had a sensational experience at Monmouth, Ill., in the dining room of the Commercial hotel with E. M. Gill, a traveling man. Gill sat at the same table with Cook and ordered for supper a piece of raw meat, when Cook remarked: "You are a Western man, I imagine. Do you live on raw flesh out there?" Mr. Gill flared up and replied: "I eat what I d—d please and pay for it. You must be an Eastern dude." Cook reprimanded him for swearing, and called upon the clerk to eject him for using profanity in the presence of ladies. Gill waved his fist in Cook's face, calling him a d—d liar, and left the table in a rage. Later he sent his card to Cook and demanded satisfaction. Cook said to the messenger: "In a fair fight I can knock that man to pieces, but I am not prepared to be perforated with bullets, and demand the protection of an officer." At his request a policeman escorted Cook to and from the opera house, where he lectured. He was unmolested by Gill, who has left town.

Lorne's Farewell to Parliament.

The governor general, in his prorogation speech Friday congratulated the members that the buoyant state of the revenue enabled them to grant aid to railways and for the construction of works of internal improvement. He closed as follows: "I desire to thank you for the great honor conferred on me by the presentation of your joint address. The princess and I have both been profoundly touched by your words, and the message of which you make us bearers, comes, as we personally know, from people determined to maintain the empire. The severance of my official connection with Canada does not lessen the tie of affection, which will ever make me desire to serve this country. I pray that the prosperity I have seen you enjoy may continue, and that the blessing of God may at all times be yours, to strengthen you in unity and peace." The Dominion parliament was formally prorogued by the governor general.

PITH OF THE NEWS.

EVENTS IN WASHINGTON.

Certain newspaper writers are getting alarmed again over President Arthur's physicial condition, and are circulating stories of his apparent ill health. Says one to-day: "When President Arthur walked through the railway station at Sixth street on his way to New York to attend the opening of the Brooklyn bridge I observed a pallor on his face that surprised me. He did not walk like a man in the best of health. I notice that the New York reporters speak of the paleness of his features on Wednesday. They state that he became very tired on that day, and that he remained in bed until a very late hour on the following morning. The president seems to be not well; doubtless he needs a period of complete rest. It is one of the miseries of a president' life that such a thing is impossible.

Col. Barr, military secretary to Secretary Lincoln, has returned from Philadelphia where he went to examine the charges against Maj. Nickerson, preferred by his late wife. Col. Barr is reticent as to what will be the character of his report. It is rumored, however, that his investigations have done nothing to lift the cloud from Maj. Nickerson's actions, and that he is apparently guilty, as charged by Mrs. Nickerson, of the most infamous conduct. It appears that he obtained a divorce from his wife, who was in Europe, by perjury on his part, and by procuring false swearing on the part of his servant.

Mr. Rogers, acting commissioner of internal revenue, has prepared a circular to collectors and others in regard to the repeal of the tax on bank capital and deposits. The circular gives the conclusions of the attorney general's opinion on this question, and states that in accordance therewith no returns will be required, either in form 106 or 67, issued on the 7th inst., for time subsequent to November 30, 1885 except from such persons, firms, associations, banks, bankers, etc., as are liable for taxation on circulation or notes paid out, referred to in items 5, 6 and 7 of said for 67.

Ingersoll closed his argument for the star route defendants on the 25th after a rapid summary. Many ladies were weeping quietly when Ingersoll sat down, and all the spectators were visibly affected. The defense here rested the case and the court adjourned until Monday.

Gen. Wallace, United States minister at Constantinople, has lodged a complaint with the government against the imposition of an ad valorem duty of 8 per cent. on imports into Turkey.

RAILROAD RUMBLINGS.

WASHINGTON, Special Telegram, May 28.—The secretary of the interior to-day sent a letter to the commissioner of the general land office instructing him to direct local land offices along the line of the Northern Pacific railroad to accept selections of land within indemnity limits of the grant to the company, and to note the same on their books when such selections are free from conflict, without requiring the company to furnish the lists of lands lost in place. The secretary says:

"It is my desire to open for settlement as speedily as possible all the lands within the indemnity limits of the grant to the Northern Pacific company, not actually required to supply the land lost in place within the granted limits. The grant should be adjusted at the earliest possible time that the orders of withdrawal may be vacated without unreasonable delay, as indicated in my letter of the 17th inst. The unparalleled demand for lands for actual settlement by great numbers of persons, not only from foreign countries, but from the older States, seeking homes under the settlement lands along the line, and in the vicinity of the Northern Pacific, requires for the best interests of the country and for all parties concerned, that the withdrawals should be maintained no longer than is actually necessary for the adjustment of the guaranteed rights of the company. In order to facilitate the work of making a settlement, I think, you should instruct the local offices that, when the clear lists of selections free from conflict and other objections are filed with the district officers and approved by them, said selections should be at once marked upon their books and forwarded for final examination, leaving the ascertainment of land lost in place to your office, instead of receiving preliminary lists of such lost lands, together with the indemnity lands, tract for tract, from the company, as heretofore. I am satisfied that the work of adjusting the grant will go forward much more rapidly under this plan than under the former practice."

Col. C. B. Lamborn, land commissioner of the Northern Pacific, returned recently from a seven week's tour of inspection of the road. Mr. Lamborn met President Villard at Portland, and accompanied him as far east as Helena. There he was detained, arranging for a location of the company's depot. Some difficulty was experienced in selecting a site, which resulted in the company selecting another location than was first intended. Col. Lamborn says the whole country west of St. Paul is growing rapidly. Immigration has been exceedingly large, and the improvement at all points has been great. The company is laying out additions at Bozeman and Helena, and in the company's shops there large forces of men will be given employment.

The national exposition of railway appliances of Chicago was thrown open to the public Thursday. The opening exercises included prayer by Prof. David Swing, address of welcome by Mayor Harrison, address by Hon. Elihu B. Washburne, introduction of veteran locomotive builders and engineers by Vice President A. French, and closing with God Save the Queen, our compliments to Victoria's birthday. A large number of people thronged the building, packing the space in front of the speaker's stand to the limits of bearing.

Postmaster Adreon of Baltimore was asked to resign nearly a year ago by the late postmaster general; but he declined to do so, and has been allowed to remain in office. It is understood that his resignation was demanded because he extorted $100 from a pensioner. It is now decided that he must go.

W. F. Merrill, general superintendent of the Chicago & Alton, has resigned, and it is understood has accepted the superintendency of the Iowa divisions of the Chicago, Burlington & Quincy railroad at a large salary.

The Milwaukee & St. Paul road increased earnings for the first four months of this year by $105,906.

GENERAL NEWS NOTES.

Is a homestead in Minnesota, after being proved up upon and previous to a patent being issued for such, liable to be assessed for taxes? This same question came up in 1877 and was submitted to Hon. George O. Wilson, then attorney general of the state, who gave his opinion based upon a decision of the United States supreme court, sixteenth Wallace, 603. to the effect that as soon as final proof was made the land became subject to taxation and must be placed upon the assessment rolls. In this opinion Attorney General Hahn coincides, as the title is in the party making the homestead, and he can transfer the same legally, regardless of the patent, which might not be issued for years.

The Northwestern Miller of the 24th in its weekly review says the improvement in the trade at Minneapolis so long looked for has not yet arrived. The daily average production is given as 11,800, a falling off of about 1,200 barrels per day. The receipts of wheat during the past week is given as 301,500 bushels, against 199,000 for the corresponding time last year, and the shipments of flour 66,430 barrels, against 40,040 for the same time last year. The wheat in store in the elevators was 1,070,000 bushels, and in the mills 344,000, a total of 1,414,000, against 1,708,000 last week. The wheat in store in St. Paul is about 475,000 bushels.

The trustees of the Red Rock Camp Meeting grounds below St. Paul at a recent meeting decided to proceed immediately with the erection of a tabernacle, octagonal in form and with a seating capacity of 1,500 exclusive of the platform, which will give accommodations for 250 more. The estimated cost of the building is $4,000. It is expected that it will be completed in time for the coming meeting, which opens June 21. The meeting will be in charge of the Rev. D. Cobb and W. K. Marshall. Thomas Harrison, the evangelist, and one or more of the bishops of the Methodist church will be present.

The crop reports received from the various stations along the several railroads leading out of St. Paul are very encouraging, except as regards corn. For the latter the weather has been too wet and cold, and the majority of corn already planted is said to be rotting in the ground. In many places, however, farmers have not as yet commenced planting and are holding off until the weather settles and the ground dries off. Wheat and small grain, however, is doing finely, and is already above ground and looking nicely.

Benton advices state that Lieut. Steele of Fort Maginnis, while out scouting with a corporal, ran on a band of twelve Canadian Cree Indians, near Mussel Shell, on the Missouri river. Finding themselves covered by Indian guns, they withdrew, and returning with reinforcements captured a band of fifty-two Indians under the Cree chief Tabor. The Indians have been started for Fort Assinniboine, and will be driven back into Canada.

The Fifth Avenue hotel, New York, is to be extended and the adjoining building in Twenty-fourth street will be torn down, and a white marble structure thirty feet high will take its place. The new extension will include the banqueting hall and about thirty additional rooms.

Gov. Butler, of Massachusetts, has vetoed a bill extending and rebuilding the Plymouth house of correction, and when the matter came before the house it was discovered that the bill had been stolen from the governor's desk, presumably by interested parties.

Maj. Wasson, the army defaulting paymaster, had a secret consultation at San Antonio, Tex., recently with his legal adviser. It is thought that the amount of the defalcation, $5,500, will be refunded before trial, with a view to escaping the penitentiary.

Postoffices have been established at Bedford, Cobourn, Sims and Wolsey, Dak., and at Drybone and Poygan, Wis.

THE CRIMINAL RECORD.

Dr. H. N. Brown of Pontiac is trying to arrest his sister-in-law, a young widow, who stole $500 from Mrs. Brown and ran away with a Chicago drummer named E N. Hoyle. The girl claims to be married to Hoyle, but is not, and is approaching maternity. They were traced to Springfield, Ill., and the girl's young child taken from her. It is said the family is very wealthy.

Johanna Long, sixty years of age, of Absecom, N. J., and evidently insane, recently attempted to jump into the Delaware river at Vine street wharf at Philadelphia. She was rescued by an officer. An old valise she had in her hand was found to contain $1,776,50 in bank notes, gold and silver, a gold watch, several articles of jewelry and a bank book showing deposits.

Orville Gibbs, aged thirty-five, shot himself through the head at Sandoval, Ohio, recently, killing himself instantly. He had just been arrested, charged with forgery to a note the name of Andrew Rice, who died a month ago. Gibbs asked leave to go to his room to prepare to accompany the officer, and shot himself.

Michae Carloss of Baltimore beat his wife and drove her to a life of shame. One day, finding her in a house of ill-fame, he shot her in the right eye. He was sentenced to two years' imprisonment in spite of his wife's entreaties for his release.

Bettini, the young lieutenant who shot himself over Miss Ayer, the pill man's daughter, who was set free, claims temporary insanity as a defense against the charge of attempted suicide.

Horace White, a Jamaica, L. I., negro, was tarred and feathered recently for having a handsome young white wife.

FOREIGN NEWS GOSSIP.

DUBLIN, May 28.—Michael Fagin, convicted of the murder of Burke, was hanged in Kilmainham jail this morning. The weather was overcast. Fagin, since receiving his sentence, has been very attentive to the instructions of the priests who visited him. In an interview recently with relatives he declared he had not hurt a hair of Burke's head. His mother is confident of his innocence, and her son wrote the queen repeating this declaration, but the letter was not answered. Canon Kennedy attended the condemned man this morning. The black flag announcing that the execution had taken place was hoisted over the jail at 8 o'clock. A strong force of police and military was present. Everything went off quietly. A small crowd of persons were collected outside the prison, a few of whom knelt in prayer for the repose of the soul of Fagin. The condemned man was pale, but appeared resigned to his fate. Death was instantaneous. Before mounting the scaffold Fagin told the priest who attended him, he hoped Irishmen would avoid secret societies.

Fagin is the third to suffer death within the past two weeks for the Phœnix park murders, Brady and Curley having preceded him as recipients of the executioner's courtesies. His trial began immediately after one of the numerous disagreements of the Kelly jury, April 25, and on the 27th ended in conviction and sentence of death. The testimony was of the same class that convicted Brady and Curley, and seemed to establish most conclusively the presence of Fagin in Phœnix park on the night of the assassinations of Cavendish and Burke and his intimate implication in the crime. Just before receiving his sentence, Fagin addressed the court, boldly announcing that he was a Fenian and would die one.

In the house of commons Lord E. Fitzmaurice, under foreign secretary, replying to a question, said he had already stated on the 19th of March that the government had never entertained a scheme to establish a British resident at the Vatican, and between the foreign office and the Vatican, and Errington had not since been a channel of communication between the foreign office and the Vatican. Errington had received no appointment from the government, and therefore no pay. The pope's circular to the Irish clergy he said had not been issued at the government. Gladstone, replying to Charles Newdegate, conservative, said Earl Granville's letter of last year, recommending Errington as a gentleman of honor and intelligence would remain in force as long as Errington answered the description.

James Carey, ex-town counselor of Dublin, and informer against the Phœnix park murderers, has found himself held in such odium by his neighbors that he is closing up his business and preparing to sell out all his property. He seems to have no friends, even among the officials, who have no further use for him. It is believed that Carey has determined to quit Ireland and settle down abroad somewhere under an assumed name.

London Cable: Various rumors of a disquieting nature are circulated about her majesty's health. It is stated that the fits of depression continue, and that the alarm of the royal family is serious. However slight the foundation for these reports may be, they have created uneasiness among her subjects, who recall the circumstances under which the reign of her grandfather ended.

The committee of the German reichstag to which was referred a Socialist motion asking for the prosecution of the police who arrested Frohme and Vohdmar, members of the reichstag, on returning from the Socialist convention at Copenhagen, has decided that the police acted in good faith and cannot be prosecuted, though their action was contrary to the constitution.

The German reichstag considering the workmen's sick fund bill on the third reading, rejected—136 to 134—an amendment introduced in the second reading, and which the government opposed as extending the operation of the measure to agricultural and forest laborers. The paragraph, with an amendment making the insurance of such laborers optional, was agreed to.

Last Sunday in Paris fifteen hundred persons joined in the anarchist demonstration at the graves of communists at Perle la Chaise. The red flag was displayed and the crowd raised frequent cries of "Vive la Commune." Several speeches were made. Many policemen were present, but nobody was arrested.

THE CASUALTY RECORD.

A year ago Mayor Stubbs of Polk City, Iowa, was shot dead in his house by parties who were evidently intent on robbery. Several persons have since been arrested on suspicion, among them W. A. Kline of Corning. He was released on a writ of habeas corpus. Saturday he was rearrested. It appears the grand jury has been investigating the murder afresh, and an indictment is the result. Kline's business associates have a great deal of confidence in his innocence.

A nitro glycerine works at Oak Grove, near Bay City, Mich., was blown to atoms Saturday, the debris being scattered for several rods. A young man named Joseph Shamburg, whom it is supposed was canning some of the explosive was torn to shreds.

Michael Curran, a laborer, was run over and killed by a switch engine of the Northern Pacific last Thursday morning, near the seventh street bridge, St. Paul. The accident was due to the carelessness of the man himself, and not to any negligence on the part of the railroad company or any of its employes.

To Serve Another Term.

A short time since the residence of Daniel Hentleman of Sheriblis Mount, in this county, was broken open during the absence of the family and $3,150 in gold and currency was abstracted. The robbery has been traced to Ed. Williams who has lately served out a sentence in the Minnesota penitentiary, and is now in jail to answer to the charge. He deposited the money in St. Paul and Minneapolis banks. Steps are being taken to recover the money and Williams will be held on a criminal charge.

Taffy for Lorne and Louise.

Ottawa (Canada) special:—Sir John Macdonald to-day in parliament, moved the presentation of an address to the governor general, who was about to be called away by the queen. He referred in terms of high praise to the manner in which the marquis of Lorne had discharged his duties since he came to Canada, and touched upon how able he was aided in doing this by the valuable assistance of his illustrious consort. Mr. Blake, leader of the opposition, seconded the motion, and testified to the marquis of Lorne's excellency as constitutional governor. The duties of the governor general were important, and he was glad to bear testimony to their being performed in an able manner by Lord Lorne, a descendent of Arygle, and belonging to that family a member of which was the first advocate of responsible government.

An Express Agent Badly Fooled.

At Cleveland, O., on Thursday last the United States Express company's money carrier, Alexander Granger, received sundry packages of money and other valuables from the east-bound Lake Shore train at the Union depot and put them in a buggy standing outside. Somebody from the ice-room called to him, and no one being in sight, he stepped a little ways from the vehicle to ascertain who called. Returning he drove to the express company's main office, and there discovered two bags similar to the company's pouches, but filled with brown paper, which had been substituted for the two containing money. It is supposed the robbery had been carefilly planned by experts and executed at the moment Granger's attention was diverted. The missing pouches are said to contain in the neighborhood of $15,000, in thirty packages of remittances from railway stations.

Keeping Out Mormon Paupers.

A letter has been sent from the treasury department to Collector Robertson of New York, with the object of preventing the landing of a cargo of Mormon immigrants, if possible. The consul at Basle, Switzerland, seemed to think that their landing could be prohibited, because they were Mormons bound for Utah. They can be forbidden to land on the ground that they are paupers, but even then it is doubtful if it can be enforced. This letter to Collector Robertson is intended to be made a test. He is directed to endeavor to prevent their landing, and left to his own devices as to the means to be employed. If he should refuse the vessel a clearance, he could only fine her $500 every time she left without it, and she would no doubt pay that in preference to taking back the paupers. The outcome of the matter will be of interest.

A Fatal Fight About Gladstone.

St. Louis dispatch: Between 12 and 1 o'clock this morning John Thorne and Joseph Jackson, two young English mechanics, became involved in a fight on a street car. Otto L. Dierberger, proprietor of a beer garden, interfered, stating that he was a justice of the peace, and with a drawn pistol threatened to arrest the men. Horne denied his authority, and resisted, and is said to have struck Dierberger, whereupon the latter shot him in the neck, the ball entering the jugular vein, killing him instantly. Dierberger was arrested. All of the parties had been drinking. The two Englishmen had been at an entertainment in the honor of the queen's birthday, and their original dispute grew out of a heated discussion of English politics.

Lorne's Farewell to the Dominion Parliament.

The governor general in his prorogation speech at Ottawa, 25th, congratulated the members that the buoyant state of the revenue enabled them to grant aid to railways and for the construction of works of internal improvement. He closed as follows: "I desire to thank you for the great honor conferred on me for the presentation of your joint address. The princess and I have both been profoundly touched by your words, and the message of which you make us bearers, comes as we personally know, from people determined to maintain the empire. The severance of my official connection with Canada does not lessen the tie of affection, which will ever make me desire to serve this country. I pray that the prosperity I have seen you enjoy may continue, and that the blessing of God may at all times be yours, to strengthen you in unity and peace." The Dominion parliament was formally prorogued by the governor general.

Murders from Jealousy.

At Cedar Hill Church, about twenty-five miles south of St. Louis, Mo., as Martha McDaniel and Amiel Deuerentz were coming from mass, they were met by Hiram Sueleuss, who carried a shotgun. As he approached he shouted, "Draw your revolver, Amiel" but, without waiting an instant, fired, killing Deuerentz. He then discharged the second barrel at the girl, perhaps mortally wounding her. The murderer then reloaded his gun, and by means of a forked stick fired again, instantly killing himself. Sueleuss was nineteen and Deuerentz twenty-three years old. The cause of the shooting is unknown.

Later advices state that Miss McDaniel, although very seriously wounded, will probably recover. The cause of the sad event was intense jealousy on the part of Sueleuss, he being desperately in love with Miss McDaniel, but she favored the suit of Deuerentz.

Opening the Great Brooklyn Bridge.

New York dispatches have copious details of the ceremonies and display attending the formal opening of the great bridge spanning the east river between New York and Brooklyn. From the towers of the great bridge national flags waved: and the span across the river was dotted with flags from one end to the other. From early morning crowds began to gather at the end where the speechmaking was to take place. In the harbor flags flew from all shipping. The war vessels Tennessee, Vandalia, Kearsarge and Yantic lay in a row off Governor's Island, flying the national colors. The navy yards and all ships along the New York and Brooklyn water front were decked with bunting. In New York business was suspended. Most of the exchanges closed at noon and many business places suspended work for the afternoon. Flags flew from the municipal and other buildings in the City Hall park, from business places along Broadway and other streets, and from many private residences. Houses along the route of the procession were decked with colors.

The Seventh regiment, N. G. S. N. Y., Col. Emmons Clark commanding, detailed as a military escort for the occasion, assembled at the armory in full uniform. A guard of twenty was detailed to march on either side of the president's carriage. The command marched down Park and Fifth Avenues to the Fifth Avenue hotel, the president's quarters; where it was drawn up. The sidewalks along the route were lined with people. On Madison square it was estimated 10,000 people were gathered.

The president and guests occupied carriages which were drawn up in line on the south side of the hotel. In the first carriage sat President Arthur and Mayor Edson, and in the other carriages, Secretaries Frelinghuysen and Folger, Postmaster General Gresham, Secretary Chandler, Attorney General Brewster, etc. The procession marched down Fifth Avenue to the City Hall park, where members of the common council received the president and cabinet. The entire line of the procession to the city hall was a continuous ovation to President Arthur and the distinguish men in his train. Continuing in their route to the bridge two by two, preceded by the military, the distinguished party moved slowly over the bridge, Maj. Jewell seeing that they did not keep step.

On account of the great crowd, much difficulty was experienced by the mayors and officials in obtaining passage way to the platform. At the conclusion of a prayer by Bishop Littlejohn, J. S. F. Stranahan, who presided, successively introduced the acting presidents of the board of trustees, who formally presented the bridge to the people of New York and Brooklyn, through their respective mayors, and each made a speech of acceptance. Congressman Hewitt also made an address and Rev. Dr. Storrs delivered an oration. Levy gave, on his cornet, The Star Spangled Banner, Hail Columbia and Yankee Doodle. After the closing exercises on the bridge the president and party drove to the house of Chief Engineer Roebling in Brooklyn and paid their respects to the great, but enfeebled engineer.

After dinner the president, governors and mayors were driven to the river, and stepping aboard a boat in waiting, steamed out into midstream, whence they obtained a delightful view of the bridge and the towers, illuminated by the tall lamps of the United States Electric Light company. The spectacle attracted seemingly even more attention than the day display. The exhibition of fireworks from 8 to 9 o'clock was fine.

During the period of the illumination of the bridge East river was crowded with every species of craft, making necessary the stoppage of ferry boats and making a terrible crush of people when traffic and travel was resumed. The people of both cities, with tens of thousands from abroad made a holliday of the affair and seemed to enjoy it very much.

The late Mrs. John O. Merriam, of Troy, who left an estate valued at over half a million, bequeathd $2,000 to the Day Home of that city, $2000 to the Troy Orphan Asylum, and $3,000 to the Troy Methodist Conference for the benefit of superannuated clergymen.

A PEACEFUL PAGEANT.

Alexandar Crowned Czar of Russia, with No Outbreak of the Dreaded Nihilists.

The Kremlin Resounding With Ceremonial Din and Filled With Dazzling Splendor.

MOSCOW, May 27.—At 7 o'clock this morning the inauguration of the magnificent ceremonies attendant upon the coronation of the emperor and empress of Russia was announced by the ringing of a hundred bells, and by the thunder of artillery. Even at that early hour the streets were thronged with people, visitors from abroad and from other parts of the empire crowding the residents, and all striving to secure eligible places from which to view the procession and such portions of the ceremony itself as those not particularly favored might be able to witness. During the entire night, in fact, there was unusual activity in the streets, for not only were people there whose anxiety concerning and interest in the coronation kept them awake, but strong guards of soldiers patrolled all parts of the city, giving the streets a very martial appearance. Great bodies of soldiers shortly before 6 o'clock were stationed along the route of the procession, four miles in length, and occupied the streets on either side, keeping people on the walk. All unreserved spaces in the streets were speedily filled by eager sight-seers, while the windows, doorways and housetops were let out at fabulous prices to visitors.

AT THE CATHEDRAL.

Those dignitaries of the realm who were to take part in the actual ceremony of the coronation assembled according to programme at the Cathedral of the Holy Assumption, within the walls of the Kremlin. These functionaries entered the magnificent building at just 7:30 a. m. At 8 o'clock there followed, in order, the princes of foreign governments, nobility of Russia and other states of Europe, and special and regular ambassadors of foreign countries residing in Russia. The utmost care was exercised to prevent admission of any unauthorized or improper persons, each one as he appeared at the entrance being required to exhibit a carefully prepared ticket which was subjected to the closest scrutiny. This form was observed both at the gate of the Kremlin and at the doors of the cathedral. At the request of Gen. Von Schweinitz, ambassador from Germany, eighty members, comprising the diplomatic corps, assembled at his mansion and were conveyed thence to the Kremlin. The remainder of the diplomatic body, consisting of attaches of the various legations, were assigned to positions in the tribune just outside the cathedral proper. When the white walls of that wondrous place closed on all of the crowd that could be admitted, a choir of boys chanted a Te Deum, and amidst profound silence outside the church, as well as in it, the clergy, accompanied by acolytes bearing crosses and ewers of holy water, proceeded to receive the czarwitz. This scion of royalty, who was in the midst of a brilliant cortege, took a place at the right hand of the throne. When it was made known to those inside the cathedral by renewed ringing of bells, by sonorous music from scores of bands and the shouts of those outside. As the royal pair appeared at the doors of the palace the immense multitude immediately uncovered their heads and burst into loud acclamations. Even women were bonnet-bare, and the enthusiasm was unaffected. At the head of the royal procession was the master of ceremonies, flanked by heralds richly clad and mounted upon pure white horses. It was of immense length, and comprised deputies from the Asiatic states of the empire, students of the university, clergy, judges, nobility and prefects from every section of the empire. When its front rank reached the doors of the palace, it was met by the emperor, wearing the white uniform of a colonel of the imperial guards, and by the empress, dressed in a Russian national costume of black velvet, richly embroidered with diamonds, and girdled with a magnificent belt of gems. The empress leaned on the arm of her royal consort. The pair placed themselves beneath a canopy, richly wrought in silk and gold, and borne by thirty-two generals of high military rank. They then took their places near the head of the procession, being directly after the regalia. At this moment the entire body of clergy emerged from the cathedral in order to meet the regalia, which they publicly sprinkled with holy water and perfumed with incense. Upon entering the portals of the cathedral the emperor and empress were received by the metropolitan of Moscow. The metropolitans of Novgorod and Kieff presented them the cross to be kissed, and sprinkled with holy water, first the emperor, then the empress, before the sacred images which flanked the doors of the cathedral. They knelt and bowed their heads, after which they were conducted to ancient thrones of ivory and silver. Alexander occupied the while the empress was seated in an arm chair gilded and encrusted with jewels. The thrones were placed upon a dais erected between the middle columns of the cathedral. Over the dais was a canopy of scarlet velvet, suspended from the arched roof, embroidered with gold and lined with silver brocade, which was worked with the arms of Russia and all her dependencies in most ingenious manner. In front of the thrones were two tables covered with gold cloth, upon which were placed the crowns and scepter. None but foreign princes were accommodated with seats. The Russian princes and dignitaries stood during the entire ceremony, according to the custom of the Greek church. The dignitaries of the realm, who were carrying the standards and seals of the empire, took their stand upon the steps of the dais. After their majesties had been seated the metropolitan of Novgorod asked the emperor in a loud and distinct voice: "Are you a true believer?" The emperor, falling on his knees, read in reply, in a clear voice, the Lord's Prayer and the Apostles' Creed of the Greek church. The metropolitan, responding, "May the grace of the Holy Ghost remain with thee," descended from the dais. The following customary summons was then three times repeated by the bishop:

THE IMPERIAL PROCESSION STARTED

ALEXANDER'S TITLES.

If there be any of you here present knowing any impediment for which Alexander, son of Alexander, should not be crowned by the grace of God emperor and autocrat of all the Russias, of Moscow, of Kieff, of Valadimir, of Novgorod; czar of Kasan, of Astrachan, of Poland, of Siberia, of Kherson-Taurida, of Grosi; geosudar of Pskoff, grand duke of Smolensk, of Lithuania, of Volhenia, of Podolia and of Finland; prince of Esthonia, of Livonia, of Courland, of Semigolia, of the Somayedes, of Bielastok, Carelia, of Foer, of Iugor, of Perm, of Viatka, of Bulgaria and of other countries; master and grand duke of the lower countries of Navgorod, of Tchenerecoff, of Rizzan, of Polotsk, of Rostoff, of Jarasloff, of Bi lusck, of Oudark Abbardensk, Kondisk, of Artelsk, of Mishtaff and of all the countries of the North, master absolute of Iversk, of Kastalrisk, of Kabardinsk and of the territory of Armenia, sovereign of mountain princes of Tcherkask, master of Turkestan, heir presumptive of Norway and duke of Sleswick-Holstein, of Stormarn, of Dithmarz and of Oldenburg, let him come forward now, in the name of the Holy Trinity, and show what the impediment is, or let him remain dumb forever.

After reading selections from the Gospel, the metropolitans of Novogorod and Kieff again ascended the dais and invested the emperor with the imperial mantle of ermine, the metropolitan of Moscow saying at the same time: "Cover and protect thy people as this robe protects thee." The emperor responded: "I will, I will, I will, God helping." The metropolitan of Novgorod, crossing his hands upon the head of the emperor, then invoked the benediction of the Almighty God upon him and his reign, and delivered to Alexander III.

THE CROWN OF RUSSIA,

who placed it upon his own head, and assuming the specter and the orb took his seat upon the throne. He then returned the insigna of his title to the dignitaries appointed to receive them, and called the empress, who knelt before him. He touched her head lightly with the crown of the emperor, and then formally crowned her with her own crown. The expression and attitude of the empress, as she knelt, was one of sympathy with her royal husband, and touched deeply the audience.

The czar preserved throughout the grave and decorous dignity and nobleness of demeanor which has provoked the admiration of all. After the empress had been duly invested with the imperial mantle, and their majesties were both seated again on their thrones, the archdeacon intoned the imperial titles and sang which was taken up and thrice repeated by the choir. Directly this part of the ceremony was finished, the bells in all the churches of Moscow rang out in chorus, a salute of 101 guns was fired, and inside the cathedral members of the imperial family tendered their congratulations to their majesties. The emperor then knelt and recited a prayer, at the end of which the clergy and all present knelt before the emperor. The bishop of Moscow said aloud, in behalf of the nation, a fervent prayer for the happiness of their majesties. Shouts of "Long live the emperor" then rent the cathedral, and were taken by the thousands outside and carried from mouth to mouth until that part of the multitude who were unable to get inside even the ample acreage of the Kremlin caught up the sound and waved their huge volume of human congratulation to the remotest parts of the city, when it was speedily made known to all the world that another czar of the Russias had been crowned.

The Cathedral choir then sang the Te Deum, after which the emperor ungirded his sword, and, accompanied by the empress and numerous dignitaries, proceeded to the gate of the Sanitary. There the metropolitan of Novgorod anointed the emperor's forehead, eyelids, nostrils, lips, ears, breast and hands, at the same exclaiming: "Behold the seal of the Holy Ghost; may it keep thee ever holy." The empress was anointed only on the forehead. Both partook of sacrament, and then left the Cathedral, wearing their crowns and mantels, the emperor also bearing the scepter and orb. After praying in the Cathedral of Michael the Archangel, their majesties returned to the palace, escorted by a procession which presented an even more splendid sight than that which escorted them to the Cathedral, being now augmented by gorgeous state-carriages of the imperial family. Banners waved from all points in the Kremlin and the whole route of the procession fairly glowed with bright draperies and hangings. The emperor re-entered the palace by the celebrated red staircase, whence laws were anciently promulgated. There he turned and saluted the people, who immediately uncovered their heads, cheering enthusiastically and blessing the czar.

The imperial banquet began at 3:30 p. m., in the hall called Granovitatia Palata. This hall was specially restored for the occasion and was splendidly decorated with cloth o gold. The emperor and empress, wearing their crowns, sat at separate tables, or thrones, of unequal heighth. Their majesties were served by distinguished nobles, acting as cup bearers, carvers, etc. The first toast was, "His majesty, the emperor," which was followed by a salute of sixty-one guns; next was "Her majesty, the empress," followed by fifty-one guns; the third was "The imperial household," followed by thirty-one guns; and the fourth was "The clergy and all faithful subjects," followed by twenty-one guns. The foreign princes and diplomatists present stood during the first course, and afterward, in accordance with the ancient custom, withdrew to a separate repast. The weather was fine throughout the day and everything passed off successfully. Silver tokens in memory of the day were distributed in twenty Moscow churches to-night.

Before their majesties left the place, the route to the cathedral was sprinkled with holy water. Heavy rain fell before their majesties started, but just as they took their places under a canopy the sun shone brilliantly. In the cathedral it was noticed when the czar knelt alone to utter the prayer of intercession; his eyes filled with tears and he sobbed. Mounted Cossacks patrolled every street. Troops lined the route, and the procession remained bareheaded, the whole morning. Those unable to obtain admission to the kremlin remained outside on their knees close to the walls during the best part of the day praying for the czar. A correspondent who has witnessed the greatest pageants of the last thirty-five years, says the spectacle culminating in the advent of their majesties, crowned and robed, was the most imposing and splendid he ever beheld.

THE COST OF CORONATION

is estimated at £2,000,000, which will be covered by the issue of treasury bills. Only thirteen newspaper correspondents were allowed inside the cathedral during the ceremony—six Russian and seven foreign, the latter including one English and one American correspondent. An academy professor and twelve Russian artists were appointed to make a complete album of the scenes of the cornation. Kremlin square was so densely packed it would have been impossible for any miscreant to have extracted his arms should he have intended to use them against the czar. The czar's crown dates from the period of Emperor Paul I., and is valued at 5,000,000 roubles.

THE CZAR'S MANIFESTO

was issued this evening, and is a document of very considerable length. Crowds besieged the printing office to obtain copies. A perusal of it caused great rejoicing. The czar has addressed the following rescript to Degiers, minister of foreign affairs:

The great power and glory acquired by Russia, thanks to Divine providence, the extent of her empire and her numerous population, leave no room for any idea of further conquests. My solicitude is exclusively devoted to the peaceable development of the country and its prosperity, to the preservation of friendly relations with foreign powers, on the basis of existing treaties, and to the maintenance of the dignity of the empire. Having found in your constant, zealous and useful colaborator for the promotion of these views in the direction of our international relations, I confer you my order of St. Alexander's nowski, in diamonds, as a testimonial of my gratitude.

LONDON, May 28.—The Times correspondent, the only English newspaper representative in the cathedral, says the ceremony was grand and imposing. My pen can give only a faint and imperfect outline of the event. The illuminations to-night are magnificent. The city looks like a mass of variegated fires.

The manifesto announces a continuance of the present state of affairs in Russia, the conditional pardon of Poles, remission of penalties for non-political offenses, and other matters as previously referred to in these dispatches.

The Perils of Army Pokering.

Washington Special: It is almost certain that the exposure of Col. A. P. Morrow will result in further exposures, which will bring a much needed purification to army circles in Washington. To state the whole case in a word, Col. Morrow is the latest victim of the army poker club here. It includes among its active players two, if not three, officers of the highest rank, and each handling and disbursing large sums o public money. With these there are a dozen military men who are known in army circles as active poker players. Col. Morrow is not by any means the first victim. Members of the club are believed to have used their knowledge of their superior's shortcomings to attempt the control of their actions in important matters of public duty, mainly in cases where punishment for offenses should have been inflicted by those superiors in the discharge of their duty. It is expected that Col. Morrow's case, which officials of high rank supposed had been buried beyond discovery, will bring out the more prominent features of the situation. This seems inevitable, because the official efforts to cover the matter up have apparently very seriously compromised a number of prominent persons. The duplication of this officer's pay accounts became known only last month. The paymaster general promptly issued an order to refuse all pay accounts of this officer. But at this point proceedings against Col. Morrow halted. It is understood that as one means of concealing the affair the duplicate pay accounts have been withdrawn and that, with the consent of superior officers, a new set of pay accounts, reaching many months into the future have been made up and signed and delivered to the bankers and others who had advanced money or taken pay accounts for debts. If it turns out to be true, every officer connected with it is liable to trial and punishment by military court.

Ex-Senator Tabor Still in Trouble.

Denver (Col) telegram: The Tabor-Bush imbroglio thickens. Some time since, it will be remembered, ex-Senator Tabor procured the indictment of William H. Bush, co-partner in the Windsor hotel, former friend and confidential adviser, for the alleged embezzlement of $20,000 while manager of the Tabor Grand opera house, and at the same time instituted a suit to recover an alleged indebtedness of $20,000. On the criminal charge Bush was tried and promptly acquitted. In his answer to the second complaint Bush denies specifically all important items, and sets up counter claims, of which the following are the most important: Seventy-five thousand dollars damages for malicious prosecution; $13,000 commissions unpaid for managing opera houses at Denver and Leadville; $10,000 for special services, as per agreement, in aiding Tabor's election to the United States senate, and in procuring a divorce from his wife and bringing about his marriage with Miss McCourt of Oshkosh, Wis: Bush's answer is a voluminous and highly sensational document.

The Perfect Saddle Horse.

The most desirable points in saddle horses are what are known as saddle gaits, the most important and therefore the most important of which is the walk.

The gaits, although common to all horses, are what are known as the saddle gaits, in the most important of which there is as wide a range of excellence as at the faster gaits of trotting and running. The average rate of speed at which horses walk in harness or under saddle is probably no more than three miles an hour while a really good walker can cover five, and in rare cases six miles under the saddle. Bring the easiest gait on both horse and rider, such horses will make wonderful journeys without distress. What is known as the fox trot is also a very desirable gait, and easily taught most horses by urging them slightly beyond a walk, and when they strike the right gait hold them on it; it is a trifle fester than a walk, and a near approach to the single foot.

Nearly all saddle horses will take a few steps to this gait when changing from a walk to a trot but will not keep it unless trained to it. The speed differs from seven to eight miles an hour. Horses will learn to like the gait, and it is an easy one for the rider, and next to the walk the best long distance gait. Single footing is nearly the same as the fox trot, and is an exact intermediate between the walk and the trot, each foot appearing to move in a sort of go-as-you-please manner, and considering that it is an exceptionally easy gait for a rider, and that an average single footer will cover nine or ten miles per hour, it is worthy of cultivation. The rack and pace are nearly alike, the only difference being in the former the hind foot reaches a trifle in advance of the fore foot on the same side while at the latter gait the feet on each side move exactly together—a purely lateral motion. Either the rack or the pace is much more desirable than the trot under the saddle, and the pace is at least as fast, if not faster gait than the trot. In addition to possessing all of the above saddle gaits the model saddle horse should be level-headed courageous and kind and should be an active and easy mover at any gait, and have a sensitive mouth, respond readily to the touch on the bridle rein, be surefooted, able and willing to trot, galop or run, as required and, above all, sound upon his legs and perfect in the wind.

WHEAT—The demand has been very light, and scarcely any business was seen, owing to conditions elsewhere, dealers have not operated to any extent, either for milling wants or speculation. Frequently on 'change it has been difficult to start bids or to get any one to buy. Offerings were moderate. Receipts light. A good deal of wheat has been withdrawn from store, belonging to Minneapolis millers, but other than that movements have been light, except one day when heavy shipments were made to Milwaukee and Eastern markets. Toward the close of the week a stronger feeling was noted among holders, partly due to cold weather. The closing market on Tuesday was stronger, without any activity. Receipts and shipments were increased. No. 1 hard, $1.11 bid, $1.12½ asked; June, $1.14 asked; No. 2 hard, $1.07 bid, $1.10 asked; No. 3, $1.01 bid; No. 3, 91c bid.

CORN—Quiet all the week, but firmly held at the close, mainly on account of the cool weather that strengthened other markets. No. 2, 50c bid, 52c asked; June, 53c asked; July, 53c asked; year, 50c bid, 52c asked. Sales: 1 car No. 2, 52c; 3 cars No. 2, year, 50c.

OATS—But little has been done during the week. On Tuesday there was a little spirit of inquiry for job lots. Speculation quiet. No. 2 mixed, 40c bid for spot and May; June, 40c bid; No. 3 mixed, 38c bid; No. 2 white, 41c bid, 42c asked; No. 3 white, 40c bid; rejected, 38c bid, 38½c asked. Sales: 1 car No. 2 mixed, 40c; 1 car do, 40½c; 1 car No 2 white, 42c; 1,200 bu No. 2 white, sacks included, delivered on levee, 44½c.

MINNEAPOLIS.

FLOUR—The situation throughout the week has been lacking in features of interest, with no material change in the outlook or in quotations, which are as follows: Patents, $6.75@7; straights, $5.75@6.10; clears, $5.25@5.50; low grades, $2.25@3.50

MILLSTUFFS—Bran has been dull and depressed during the week, except for sacked, which is scarce and firm. Fine shorts has also been in good demand at fair figures. Other millstuff unchanged. Quotations are as follows: Bran, weak at $6@6.25 in bulk; $8.50 sacked. Fine shorts, $9@9.50; coarse, $8@8.50; mixed feed, $18@20, according to quality. Coarse corn meal, about $1 per ton below the price of mixed feed.

WHEAT—The weak opened with rather a strong feeling, but there was a marked decline, culminating on Saturday in sales of No. 1 hard at $1.11½. There was a reaction Monday and an advance Tuesday, when the last sales were at $1.12½, with plenty of bids of $1.12 not taken. Other sales were not of interest as telling the tone of the market. Quotations: No. 1 hard, spot, $1.12½; seller June, $1.14½; seller July, $1.14½; No. 2 hard, $1.09; No. 1 Northern, $1.09; No. 2 Northern, $1.06; No. 3 Northern, $1. Millers' association prices were: No. 1 hard, $1.11; No. 2 hard, $1.06; No. 1 regular, $1.06; No. 2 regular, $1.01; No. 3, 96c.

CORN—Has been dull and inactive throughout the week, with a decline of ½c, which was afterward recovered, the closing being firm at the following quotations: No. 2 spot, 50½c; seller June, 51½c; condemned, 47@49c.

OATS—Opening firm, this grain suffered a slight decline, owing to increased receipts, but closed strong as follows: No. 2, 41½c in store, and 42½c f. o. b.; white, 42@43c; rejected, 38@40c by sample.

Remenyi is not only the peer among musicians, but also a good judge of beauty, and knows a good thing when he sees it. After a ride about Detroit and surrounding country last Thursday he stated that in his opinion it is the prettiest place in this country and backed up the assertion by investing $2,350 in Detroit dirt, on the lake front. He also stated that he would soon decide upon the plans for a beautiful cottage which he proposes to build on the lake shore.—[Detroit Record.

Grazing and Soiling

If cows must graze, they should have pastures on which the feed is plenty, and accessible with the least possible amount of labor. But it is not profitable to have cows subsist entirely by grazing, especially where land has much value, because it requires so great an area to support them. There is no way in which ground yields so little food as in pasturing. The surface may be covered ever so thickly with grass, yet produce but little food, because the growth is so frequently interrupted and put back by the injury done by constant cropping. As much food will grow on one acre, where it is allowed to grow without molestation, as will grow on three acres when mutilated by being bitten of every few days, the circumstances being in other respects the same. The costliness of the grazing system was well illustrated by the statement of a practical farmer recently in a farmers' club. He said, when he began farming, a few years ago, on 100 acres, he cultivated forty acres, and had sixty acres in meadow and pasture, and found it difficult to keep stock equal to twelve cows. He has now adopted the plan of cultivating and gathering the food for his stock, and as a consequence he has reduced his grass land to thirty acres, and finds no difficulty in keeping the equivalent of thirty-six cows, and has seventy acres of land to cultivate instead of forty.—[National Live-Stock Journal, Chicago.

County News.

Fisher's Fancies.

From the Bulletin.

Several prairie schooners with accompanying stock, and a large following of children passed through town yesterday bound for north Polk county.

There is a complaint, wafted across the Red "that the boom is dead," that the great influx of emigration so eagerly expected in North Dakota did not materialize. All such things must have an end, and the sooner that sort of a crisis is reached the better for the country, if not for the speculators. This side of the Red river realized the situation some time ago, and is now in a condition to earn an income from the profits of production. A moments reflection will convince any reasonable man, that a country like this, having the seed planted, which will yield a crop to be harvested within the next three months, worth over $2,000,000, is of more value than a gold mine. A soil that returns so vast a percentage to the cultivator, year after year without failure, does not need artificial booming.

Last week we copied the Polk County JOURNAL's account of the shooting of Israel LaFortune by Sheriff Zwickey, reserving comment until full particulars could be obtained. The Sheriff has been severely censured for using arms in the capture of this man, but by the words of Sheriff Jenks, of Grand Forks, the man is "a bad citizen, a hard man to capture." He is said to be the man who shot Lewis Gonyea, and was cleared by the aid of the noted criminal lawyer, Erwin, two years ago. He had been living on his claim in the town of Blackriver, and the sheriff received a warrant for his arrest, he being charged with burning a neighboring shanty, belonging to a Mrs. Jones, for the purpose of hiding a theft of windows and lumber, part of the property having been found in his possession. At the time of shooting, the sheriff met LaFortune two and a half miles east of Crookston, and told him he was under arrest, when the prisoner urged his horse to a run and attempted an escape; the sheriff ordered him to stop, and as he did not he put a bullet through him. The Sheriff says that he intended to cripple the horse. The Sheriff is privileged to have intentions which may have been all right or wrong, that has nothing to do with the case, his business was capture his man, even should his death follow from resistance to the official. Let the desperate characters understand that every citizen stands at the side of the single executive officer, if you would have the law obeyed and the criminal class kept under. A revolver was found on the person of La Fortune after the sheriff brought him to the Lake View House, in Crookston. He is said to be improving as rapidly as can be expected from so severe a wound, and Shriff Zwickey is doing all in the power of man for the recovery of his prisoner.

East Grand Forks, Facts

From the Courier.

The population of East Grand Forks is at least one-fourth larger than it was six weeks ago!

The boom has surely struck us. A Chinaman was in town Monday and rented a part of the Hennish building and will open a laundry at once.

Mr. Masterson informs us that the recent loss of Capt. Barton, has been settled to that gentleman's entire satisfaction, as far as the Continental Insurance Company is concerned.

Penessupup, Haeggaso and Obenequar, three Indians from the Red Lake country, were in town Monday. It is seldom we are so honored these days by such eminent gentlemen.

We don't want to be over sanguine or make ourselves ridiculous, but we would like to make a prophecy, viz: That the population of East Grand Forks will double itself within six months from to day! Cut this out and paste it in your scrap book.

When the country editor drags along all week without running against a real, live, sure enough local happening and the foreman says he must have a four-liner before he can "lock up," the c.e. gazes at the ceiling for a few minutes and then writes: "The festive spring fly has commenced .·.;'ing all over our delicately-papered sanctum."

The capital commission has been prancing around all over Dakota looking for a place for the capital, and it seems as if they are rather undecided where would be a decent place to put it. Well gentlemen, although it is true we are outside of Dakota, but if you can't come to a decision we would suggest you come and take a look over East Grand Forks.

The first Presbyterian services ever held in East Grand Forks took place in the school building last Sunday evening. Rev. D. C. Dunn, of New York, who has just located among us, occupied the pulpit, and delivered a very interesting and able discourse with which the audience were well pleased, and expressed their approval. Mr. Dunn is a very pleasant and agreeable gentleman, and has already made a host of friends, and we take pleasure in extending in behalf of our citizens, a hearty welcome and wishes for success in this worthy cause he desires to promote.

Mr. A. E. Sawyer of Crookston this state, writes us that he owns several lots near the depot, and intends to put up a building as soon as the road gets here for rent.

W. C. Jones is circulating a subscription list, to raise money to fix the wagon road between St. Hilaire and Crookston, and will commence work this week. This is a very important enterprise which has been too long neglected.

How Is The Wheat Crop?

The general anxiety for reliable news in regard to the wheat crop of 1883 has been very generally responded to by the recent publication of official statements not only of the statistical division of the Department of Agriculture at Washington, but by the secretaries of the Agricultural Boards in several states. Our own readers have been able to tell for themselves from the weekly reports for which we are indebted to over 1,000 painstaking and reliable correspondents, that the outlook of this crop was by no means encouraging and far below the average level at this, date, and the careful consideration of the official reports simply confirms, occasionally more than confirms, our own reports of the past four weeks. The situation may be briefly summarized as follows: The winter wheat crop from present indications will fall short of last year's by at least 75,000,000 bushels, though we are inclined to think that 85,000,000 would be nearer the truth With the very best conditions from now on however, the shortage cannot be less than the first named figure, and while it is not altogether likely that the crop will have no further set-back still the weather outlook so far as the winter wheat crop is concerned, is not unfavorable.

Spring wheat cannot yet be estimated, and we can only warn our readers to receive with caution the statements usually made about this time of year in regard to the great increase in spring wheat acreage. In spite of the great Dakota boom, let it be remembered that in other sections the spring wheat acreage is constantly diminishing, leaving always something to deduct from the westward increase, to correctly estimate the total. It is not our province nor intention to advise our readers regarding the course they should pursue in the holding or disposal of their crops. We simply deem best to collect and lay before them the fact as promptly and correctly as possible their's the duty to intelligently consider then and guide themselves accordingly In view of a wheat crop of at most 425,000,000 bushels, probably less, it may worth while they should note some facts in regard to the demand already published in the Farmers Review, but which, for their convenience, we will reproduce here. Our home consumption, including seeding will not fall short, estimating or present population at 55,000,000 of 280,000,000 bushels. We have it is true, a surplus from the 1882 crops, but not a large one in proportion to that year's crop, for when the 1882 crop, was harvested we were comparatively bare of wheat, and we began to draw at once, upon the new supply. Moreover, it was an early crop, and this year's crop seems likely to be a late one, thus extending the time between the crop of 1882 and the crop of 1883 beyond twelve months.—[The Farmers' Review.

Supt. Mathews returned from Crookston to-day with a car load of brick for the syndicate block. NICHE, D. T., May 28, 1883.

EDITOR JOURNAL: Will you please find space in your paper for a few lines from one who is interested in new townsites. A trip to the Thief River country made my eyes glisten. I had heard about it often, but never had the pleasure of seeing until last week. It is perfectly lovely, without a blemish to mar its beauty, and can be compared to Cincinnati in a few years. So far as I could learn, Geo. Maxfield sold a part of his land last fall for a townsite, together with a fine water power, but the parties that bought have failed in their contract, thus doing a great damage to that country. We learn, however, that John Labree is hard at work making posts and stakes, and that the survey of the new townsite will begin next week. Charlie Kretzschmar is interested in the townsite, and when he takes hold of an enterprise it is sure to succeed.

Protection Against Tornadoes.

Prairie Farmer.

The cyclone which wrought such havoc in Mississippi recently, has been succeeded by several others which, though less disastrous, were, nevertheless, attended by some loss of life and much destruction of property. The cyclone period extends from April to September inclusive; and it is highly probable that the present season will witness more of these dreaded visitations. In addition to what the Prairie Farmer has already published on the subject, we give some additional facts which have been gathered from the observations of the Signal Service and other sources, indicating the approach of a cyclone, and further suggestions also as to what may be done for protection. The premonitory signs are easily perceptible to and comprehended by every one.

Several hours previous to the appearance of the tornado clouds the atmosphere is sultry and oppressive. Clouds form first in the southwest, and then almost immediately in the northwest, or vice versa. If they are light their appearance resembles smoke issuing from a burning building or strawstack, rolling up in fantastic shapes to great heights: again, like a fine mist, or quite white, like fog or steam. These dark clouds at times present a greenish or copperish hue. Again they appear jet black from center to circumference; and they sometimes present a purple or bluish tinge, or, at times are strangely lurid, but always with what appears to be black smoke surrounding them. The clouds form in the southwest and northeast, and finally come together with a terrific crash, and then the funnel-shaped tornado cloud appears upon the western sky moving boldly to the front from within the confused mass. A heavy, roaring noise like that of a heavy-loaded freight train passing over a bridge or through a tunnel, is heard, and then the cyclone or tornado is upon you. Now, as some of these signs appear hours in advance of any danger; as these storms appear only in certain seasons of the year, and as they are restricted to certain sections of the country, it would seem that there ought to be means of foreseeing them and preventing any great loss of life. And there are very [illegible] Although these storms are just as bad on the Western prairie as in Mississipi, the loss of life there is very light, because the farmers and villagers know what precautions to take when a tornado visits them.

The Signal Service gives this warning. If caught in a tornado always move with all possible dispatch to the north, unless in so doing you are obliged to cross the entire path of the storm. A glance toward the west will tell you whether you are on the southern edge of the probable path of the tornado cloud or more to the north. If in the centre, or half way between the centre or southern edge, your chances are best in a direct course to the north. If further to the south, move directly and very rapidly to the south, bearing slightly east. In no event should you ever run directly east or northeast. There is always sufficient time to escape the tornado. even if it be but a few rods from you, for its breadth is only a few hundred feet; as a general thing the tornado cloud is seen at from one to three miles distance, giving you from one to three minutes" warning—sufficient time to enable you to get from a quarter to half a mile out of its course.

As for houses they are no protection, and are to be shunned in a storm of this kind. No building has been or is likely to be devised that can withstand the force of a tornado. A frame house is better than a brick or stone one, because it is more elastic than one of two-stories. But, whatever the style or character of the house, always leave it if it is in the path of a tornado. The Signal Service recommends as the best place of safety a cellar or a dug-out, and many farmers in Kansas have constructed these dugouts—simply holes in the ground, covered to protect the inmates from flying timbers, where they can run in the event of tornadoes. Under no circumstances, whether in a building or cellar, ever take a position in a northeast corner, in an east room, or against an east wall, even. Remember, also, that the tornado invariably moves in a northeasterly direction. This simple rule will save nineteen-twentieths of the lives now sacrificed to the storm fiend. If forced to remain in your house, and where you have no cellar, always take a position against the or south wall—the former is the better—either facing downward upon the floor or standing with your back to the wall; and always take your final position on the first or ground floor. Never stand or lie in front of a door or window, near a stove or heavy piece of furniture, and always close your doors and windows. If you are out of the house, avoid forests and groves, make for the open field, and throw yourself, face downward toward the east, and your arms over your head to protect it. Such are precautions to be taken, well understood in Kansas and Iowa, but little known in Mississippi. It is due to a comprehension of them that the same storm which reckons up a mortality of over 200 in the South, passed through Iowa with heavy destruction of property, but without the loss of a single life.

The train was three hours late on Monday.

S. W. Ritchie and wife, of St. Hilaire, are visiting friends in the city.

Bang's hostelry has all the business it can attend to being full every day.

Bismarck gets the capitol and will be the capital city of Dakota. 'Rah for Bismarck.

Ole Bang has the Celebrated Michells LaCrosse bottled beer constantly on hand. Also Anheuser.

The Rev. Smith, formerly pastor of the Congregational church of this city is expected here on a visit this summer.

McKinnon Brothers are getting up an elegant milk wagon for Jerome's milk route. It will make its debut (as it were) on Saturday.

Dr. A. A. Just has removed his office into the rooms over Eiken Brother's hardware store and now has pleasant apartments on the corner.

Charlie Churchill is decorating the new drug store on Robert Street with paint. It will be ninety-seven thousand different colors or there abouts.

Jake Francis has lost one of his horses lately. The animal had been too lame to work for a long time and got so bad off it had to be shot.

Frank Jerome leaves to-night for southern Minnesota after three carloads of stock. He will bring one of choice beef cattle, one of sheep and one of milch cows.

Mr. Clark Van Housen has accepted a clerkship in the Auditor's office and will fill the bill to a dot. Auditor McGuire shows his usual good sense in the selection.

It is rumored that W. H. Fisher has secured the contract for building the Duluth & Winnipeg track. We have been unable to trace the rumor to a reliable source.

John O'Brien has received advices from W. Kistenmacher and wife stating that they sailed from New York to Hamburg on Thursday May 31st. They will be gone about two months.

Dr. Froshaug, of Twin Valley, Norman Co., gave his friends in the city a pleasant call on Monday. He reports crops looking splendidly all through that section and predicts big yields.

R. J. Montague has bought the building formerly occupied by Wm. Kistenmacher as a residence and moved it to a lot east of the school house. He paid $200 for the house and $100 for moving.

Conductor Alexander has a sixty day furlough and will spend it with his friends in Massachusetts Accompanied by his wife he left on Monday evening. Mrs. Alexander will remain some time at a water cure in New York for the benefit of her health.

Henry Nolan has got the frame work of the Lee & Herrick flouring mill up and partly enclosed. The last story was put up on Monday and the roof of the magnificent building will soon be up. From our sanctum window we are watching the progress with "an h'eye like a h'eagle."

Some kind of a circus struck this town on Friday, but we opine, did not get extravagantly rich here. The disgruntled victims who went to see it were too ashamed to own it so we could not find out what kind of a racket they gave. The gamblers in the streets did not seen to reap a very rich harvest as their little grabs were too transparent. Such snide affairs should be let severely alone then they will subside.

Maj. Riddell gave an interesting lecture in the Bapist church on Tuesday evening which was listened to with wrapt attention by a large audience. The Major told in a plain and entertaining manner some of his thrilling experiences as a soldier and scout, and a feeling of disappointment was manifest at the close that the time had been so short. The major is a pleasant, fluent speaker and has a happy way of spicing his talk that is very entertaining. We should like very much to hear him again.

Some smart Aleck sent a telegram to the Pioneer Press last week stating that farmers in Polk County would not neglect to thresh their wheat in order to DO THEIR BREAKING again this fall as they did last. We would like to see the color of that fellow's wool. Any man, woman or child, who, in this Valley, does not know enough to know that farmers do not break in the fall would be a greater curiosity than Barnum's celebrated what-is-it. If anybody should believe that telegram he would naturally set down the farmers of this Valley as a set of infernal idiots.

Work on the flouring mill on Sampson's Addition has been stopped, owing to some defect in construction which will necessitate taking down the frame already up and an entire re-construction. Mr. Sampson, as soon as the error was discovered, went at once to Minneapolis and ordered timber to replace the frame and men will be put upon the work of re-construction as soon as the timbers arrive. While away, Mr. Sampson made arrangments to have the side-track laid to the Addition at once and brought along some surveyors to locate the track. He also attended to the shipping of wire rope for the foot-bridge over the dam and just as soon as it arrives the foot-bridge will be constructed. Timber for the wagon bridge is being gotten out as rapidly as possible and the bridge will soon be a reality. Notwithstanding the halt in the flouring mill building there has been no let up in other buildings which are springing up on every hand until the Addition looks like a young and thriving city. Sampson's Addition is bound to boom and don't let it escape your memory.

Ole Bang has some choice champagne cider and ginger ale on tap.

St. John's Day will be duly observed in this city on June 25th. No pains nor expense will be spard to render the occasion an enjoyable one.

Ethan Allen, the Warren boomer, was looking us over on Saturday with a view to finding out the most approved styles of booming He caught on in good shape.

Our Sheriff has a h'eye like a h'eagle. On Monday he walked into the Daily Tier office and took possession of that institution with a view to collecting a few hundred dollars.

A meeting of the County Central Committee will be held at the office of Brower & McLean on Saturday evening next to call a County Convention to elect delegates to the State Convention.

Capt. Donaldson and H. Eustrom, the former a large farmer and the latter County Auditor of Kittson Co., came down on Saturday evening to gaze upon the wonders and beauties of our thriving city.

We are advised by a poster received from Red Lake Falls that the French are making preparations to celebrate St. John's Day at that place this year. A big program is prepared and a good time anticipated.

Hon. Jas. J. Hill is up from Wisconsin looking after his interests here and says that we (our city and county) are much better looking than we were and our improvements are a matter of wonder even for this country.

The sale of reserved seats for the Sol Smith Russell engagement will be at Tom Morris' jewelry store and we would suggest to all that intend to witness this entertainment, to secure their seats in time, as there will be a rush.

Mr. Harry Ives, son of Judge F. Ives, has returned from school at Ada, Ohio having finished his course at the university. Harry has returned, several feet handsomer and much better tall and is going to study law in a real estate office at St. Hilaire.

The temperance lecture at the M. E. church on Friday evening last was listened to by a good audience. Mrs. Hebert's address was a very eloquent one indeed, full of sound, practical common sense. A branch of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union has been organized.

Play-goers should bear in mind that the romantic and picturesque comedy drama, "Edgewood Folks," including that famous comedian, Sol Smith Russell, will be given at Eriesson's Hall Tuesday evening the 12th inst. We advise all to secure seats at once, as the demand will be large.

The New Orleans Jubilee Singers are booked for Eriesson's Hall on Saturday evening June 16th. They will give one of their unrivalled entertainments for the benefit of the Congregational Society and we trust that a full house will greet them. Reserved seats, 75 cents, will be on sale at Tom Morris' after next Monday. By what our exchanges say of this troupe we can heartily commend them.

Herb's new bazar, corner of Main and Robert Streets, is in running order and now we know those cigars are good ones because we were permitted to lift the covers and sample them—yum, yum! He has every brand in the market and in smoking tobaccos, the "Old Judge" "Gold Flake" "Vanity Fair" "Cut Cavendish" and every other known brand in endless profusion. In candies, nuts, apples, lemons, oranges and bananas he has a large and nice stock to please every one. Call and see Herb.

The fire bell on Sunday afternoon called out the department in double quick time. But no sooner had the boys reached the court house than it was found that nothing could be done the fire had done its worst and consumed a small barn belonging to Mr. H. Watts, ye lumberman on the hill. It was a small barn but contained a quantity of fine lumber and lath, which, with the structure could not be replaced for $250 we are told. The JOURNAL noted a short time ago the burning of a barn at St. Hilaire belonging to Mr. Watts.

Mr. C. W. Fletcher, the gentlemanly manager of the Fletcher Surprise Party gave us a pleasant call on Wednesday morning. He is making arrangments for giving an entertainment in Eriesson's Hall next Friday evening. This company is well spoken of by the press so far as we have seen. One feature of program is the gift enterprise in which $50 in cash is given away. Every ticket draws an envelope in which is a card with a number or blank. If a number, the holder is entitled to a gift ranging from 25 cents to $20. Tickets 35 and 50 cents for sale at Tom. Morris'. No extra charge for reserved seats.

A meeting of the Opera House Joint Stock Company was held in the office of Brower & McLean on Monday evening with K. D. Chase for president and John McLean secretary. The secretary's report shows $13,000 subscribed and $7,000 yet to raise. A committee consisting of Rev. C. E. Page, Ansel Bates and Isadore Fortier was appointed to continue soliciting subscriptions, and K. D. Chase, W. D. Hurlbut and D. Jacobus a building committee. The building will be 50x100 feet on the ground containing two store rooms below with hall above both. In rear of the store rooms will be a room 20x50 devoted to the purpose of a free reading room. There will be a meeting at the office of Brower & McLean this evening to organize. The advantages of this institution to the city are too many and great to be summed up in one short newspaper article and we trust that the project will not fail.

The Polk County Agricultural Society held a meeting in city hall on Saturday evening which was well attended showing much interest in this matter. The secretary's report showed over $10,000 signed but only a trifle over $400 paid up. John McKinnon, W. H. Jennings and John McLean were appointed a committee to solicit subscriptions to stock and to collect subscriptions. Mr. M. R. Brown stated that if the matter was settled soon and the Fair Grounds secured he would furnish teams to grade the track and put it in shape. The Association has an opportunity of obtaining 40 acres at $30 per acre which is a rare chance and should be accepted by all means. Everybody who is interested in the welfare and prosperity of our county should take at least one share. If the property is now acquired and put in proper shape it will be worth at least $100 per acre. The bare land, next year will be cheap at $50. We trust that all will see the importance of this matter and take a share or so and thus aid in the formation and maintenance of an Agricultural Society.

The bell tower is receiving a coat of paint put on by W. H. McCulough.

D. K. Smith and family have departed for their new home in Denver, Col.

Herb Mason opened out on the thirsty crowd on Wednesday with a new soda fountain. Try it.

The St. Paul Globe raises the old battle cry of Tildricks and Henden for the Democratic presidential ticket of 1884.

Tom Ratchford is reported to be very sick. His speedy recovery is earnestly wished for by his many friends.

The entertainment at the M. E. Church last evening was fairly well attended and must have yielded quite a revenue to the church coffers.

M. E. Bartlett on the JOURNAL farm is putting a neat addition to his farm house which will add comfort and beauty in a highly satisfactory degree.

Charlie Davis received an elegant marble soda fountain this morning which will soon be fizzing with nice liquid refreshment for thirsty humanity.

Capt. Soule was in from the Russia Farms on Wednesday. He reports everything booming down there especially in the vegetable kingdom. He will take a trip east in a few days.

LaFortune, the man arrested by the Sheriff's little pop, is doing nicely and is on the high road to a speedy recovery. His physician reports his progress remarkably rapid and expects he will soon be able to be up.

Charlie Davis' ice cream parlors will open out on Saturday next when he will be prepared to entertain you and your best girl in accordance with the statutes of the State of Minnesota in such cases made and provided.

Judge Woodruff and M. W. Scott, of Grand Forks, were gazing upon the Crookston dam and water works on Wednesday and noticed they were "the boss." The imposing structure of the Lee & Herrick flouring-mill impressed them favorably.

Sol Smith Russell's new comedy drama is one of the few successful plays of the present season, and Sol is enjoying a "boom." At all his city engagements he has been greeted by packed houses, and is booked for returned engagements in Chicago, St. Louis, Philadelphia, Brooklyn and New York.

Mr. W. Lemen, of Angus, was in the city on Wednesday, reporting matters in a flourishing condition in the coming city of Angus. He says that on Saturday last a tramp passed through Angus having a large overcoat with innumerable packets therein, a bed-tick and cooking utensils. The man gave his name as Fred Jeffreys, said that he had walked all the way from eastern Virginia and was going to Winnipeg as he was an Englishmyn and did not like the laws of the United States.

Friend Buchanan has received a visit from the busy, burgling burglar who burgled three or four dollars of the root of evil and, being possessed of tastes of a refined nature also took along three or four hundred cigars to smoke on their festive journey through this vale of tears. These little irregularities are becoming altogether too frequent and the first thing those chaps knows they will hear something drap! Already there is a clue to their identity which they wot not of and we would advise them to look a leedle ouid.

A trip to Angus on Saturday revealed to us the growing wealth and prosperity of the county north of us. We found Euclid grown to be a thriving little village of probably 400 or 500 souls containing a fine school house, a large hotel, several business houses and grain elevators. A new Era grader was at work upon the principal streets mending the ways in fine shape and everybody seemed prosperous and happy. All along the route we saw fields of wheat looking splendidly, everything betokening an abundant harvest. Arrived at Angus we looked that thriving little burg over a bit and then pushed on out to the fine farm of our former fellow-townsman, J. M. Palmer, where, after getting outside of a splendid repast we were permitted to visit his fine stock, horses, colts, hogs and cattle and fields of growing grain. Here we learned that much threshing was yet to be done in this neighborhood. One farmer after having threshed his wheat this spring, sowed a large quantity and furnished his neighbors some for seed found that not a kernel of it would grow although it came out bright and handsome looking. Getting back to Angus before train time we had time to look over it more thoroughly and found that a townsite has been laid out and that a new hotel and some store buildings are projected. There is already a mammoth elevator, whose towering form can be seen for miles around. It is just being finished and receiving a coat of paint. Angus is located in a tract of as fine farming land as the county contains and we see no reason why she should not boom right lively in the near future. As a grain market it will be unrivalled and this fact seems to warrant the prophecy of a brilliant future.

Prof. Carruth is indefatigable in his efforts to make the first teacher's institute in Polk County, a grand success. In addition to the instructors already mentioned in these columns he has secured the President of the St Cloud Normal School, Prof. Jerome Allen, and the Rev. P. O. Streemme, Supt. of Schools for Norman Co., who will take an active part in the exercises, giving lectures at some time during the week. Most of the trustees in the county have agreed to allow the teachers to attend and pay them their wages the same as though they taught, realizing that the benefits the teachers will derive from the Institute will be a sufficient equivalent to the districts. In response to our request to citizens so to do many have tendered to Mr. Carruth the hospitality of their homes for the teachers and yet there is room for more to do so. Mr. C. says that there are about 25 teachers yet unprovided for and as the Institute will commence its labors on Monday next we trust that all who can do so and feel disposed to aid the cause of education will come forward and inform Mr. C. so that he may have every help in his good work. He has done good solid work in this cause and deserves to be encouraged in the good work whose influence will be felt for good for years. Our city now has an opportunity to show that she is not behind her sister cities in enterprise and hospitality. All who will entertain should notify Prof. Carruth as soon as possible to the end that he may have his teachers provided for and thus contribute in no small degree to make the first Polk County Institut a grand success.

Oh! Thim Stove Pipes!

A few weeks ago one lovely Saturday afternoon a good looking "plug" hat appeared upon our streets, surmounting the caput of a whilom newspaper man and now—lo, wondrous change! Every fellah you meet, who has any style is crowned with a great, tall wondrous, shiny stove-pipe! Yea, the woods are full of 'em. In some cases one is led to wonder how a nice looking "plug" can submit to crown such iniquity, but then, as Doc. Thomas says: "A nice silk plug hat don't seem to care who walks under it!"

Out of the Depths.

The Norman County Alert, since it changed hands has become an excellent local paper. Its present proprietors seem to be gentlemen who have a reputation at stake and the Alert, now called the Index, shows the effects of having reputable men at the helm. Out of the slums of filth into which it had been plunged by a reckless, characterless adventuring tramp, the Index rises purified as far as it may be in so short a time but it has yet an up-hill road to travel so tenaciously do old associations cling.

DEFECTIVE PAGE

BROOKLYN BRIDGE TRAGEDY.

Twelve Persons Killed and Many Injured as a Result of Stupidity Unparalleled.

Shortly after 4 o'clock last Wednesday afternoon a panic occurred at the most dangerous point on the footpath of the great bridge between Brooklyn and New York, and fourteen persons, men, women and children, were trampled to death in a mad rush that was absolutely needless, or, as it is believed, was started by pickpockets. The alarm was at once given in the proper quarters. Ambulances were sent as speedily as possible, and reserves of policemen to the number of nearly 100 were ordered out from different station houses. Then the dead and dying were so quickly taken to the various station houses and hospitals that before those who were passing the Brooklyn entrance when the disaster occurred, had reached the spot, almost every evidence of it had been removed. Quickly as it occurred, however, it cannot be quickly told, nor were all the details to be learned quickly. One after one the dead were picked up and tenderly carried away. The wounded so far as can be ascertained were sixteen in number. Besides these, there were dozens, probably scores, who either received injuries too slight to require hospital attention, or who were carried away by their friends without giving notice to the police. In the latter category were certainly a considerable number of persons, for many were seen to be taken away.

From the Sun Extra: There was a crash at the steps at the New York approach to the Brooklyn bridge this afternoon. A panic followed, and at least fourteen persons were killed and many wounded. The crush began shortly before 4, and at that hour there were thousands of people on the bridge, most of them coming from Brooklyn. The air was clear and brisk, and people walking rapidly. As the crowd approached the short flight of steps, those in front pushed back for fear they would be precipitated over the steps a distance of about six feet. These people, in drawing back from the steps, made the nucleus of the jam, for thousands behind them pushed on unheeding. Almost instantly people began to shout, "Stand back!" and "Give us room!" Meanwhile the crowd from New York, which was at the foot of the stairs, got blocked. Men at the head of the New York crowd fought their way back, leaving a clearing space at the head of the steps. The shouting and crowding from the Brooklyn side increased. It was utterly inexplicable. People in the advance guard of the Brooklyn throng were pushed in spite of themselves towards the steps. They seemed to have a horror of going over the steps, although the flight is only five or six feet high. They locked arms and pushed furiously back against the thousands coming steadily over from Brooklyn. In a few minutes, at a point just above the steps, there was a slow yielding to the frightful pressure from behind, and the front of the crowd was forced nearer and nearer to the edge of the steps. Women and children were screaming for help, and men children were shouting confusedly. Umbrellas, parcels and canes were thrown over the rails at the side by people who needed their hands to fight their way

OUT OF THE DESPERATE CROWD.

At last with a single shriek cutting through the clamor of thousands came the voice of a young girl who lost her footing on the perilous edge, and fell headlong. She struck the pathway at the foot of the steps. She raised herself on her hands and would have got up, but in another moment she was buried four deep under the bodies of others who fell over the steps after her. She was dead when they got her out, more than half an hour afterward. The men sprang up the rails at the sides, and waved the crowd back from both sides, but the people continued to crowd on toward the steps. No police were in sight. Every minute the excitement grew worse. Men in the crowd lifted children above their heads to save them from the crush. People were still paying their pennies at both gates and swarming on. At last people at the New York end of the bridge understood what was happening, the gates were closed, and word was sent to Brooklyn to close the gate there. Messengers were sent to the police station at Oak street, but before any outside help came the bridge police, assisted by citizens, pressed two grocery wagons to the ambulance service. They were loaded with dead and dying and driven off the bridge, followed by crowds of distracted men and women. As the wagons came out into the street they were obliged to stop to allow a brilliant, uniformed band, playing gay music to pass up Chatnam street. Twelve dead bodies had been laid in the basement of the Chambers street hospital at 6 o'clock.

LYNCHING IN IOWA.

A Winterset Iowa Mob Finally Mustered Courage to Lynch the Newell Murderer at the Third Attempt.

Des Moines Special Telegram, June 3—. About a week ago the particulars of a foul murder committed almost a year ago near Winterset, Madison county, was first made public. A convict, named Pugh, who was serving out a sentence for horse stealing, furnished the evidence which led to the discovery. The murdered man's name was Newell, and he had mysteriously disappeared on the 13th day of last June. Pugh stated that the missing man had been murdered by a farmer named John Hamner for the purpose of robbery, Newell having but a short time previously received several hundred dollars pension money, and that the body of the dead man was buried in the woods near Hamner's farm. Pugh was brought from the penitentiary to Winterset, and in company with the sheriff drove out near the Hamner place and pointed out the spot. A vigorous use of shovels soon discovered a human body in an advanced stage of decomposition. There was a bullet hole in the head, and the skull was fractured by a rock, and the throat was cut. There was indisputable evidence that the remains were those of Newell, and that he had been murdered. Pugh stated that Hamner had disclosed the fact of the murder to him; that he had assisted in the burial. There was further corroborative evidence of an indisputable character, showing that Hamner did the deed, and the coroner's jury so found. Hamner was held in the Winterset jail, and his preliminary examination fixed for the coming week.

On Wednesday night a mob gathered at the fair grounds for the purpose of lynching the prisoner, and marched into town. They were met at the public square by the police, and were driven back and dispersed. The attempt was repeated Thursday night, but was again defeated by the interference of officers. Two successive failures caused considerable sport among law abiding citizens, but as nothing was done Friday night, it was supposed better counsel had prevailed, and the attempt would not be repeated. Everything was unusually quiet in the village last night, but about 2:30 o'clock this morning the town was sudenly aroused by the ringing of the court house bell and the rapid discharge of small arms. The mob, about seventy-five men, some on foot and some mounted, had quietly surrounded the court house. Hamner was in jail, which is located in the basement. While most of these stood guard, a portion rushed for the jail. The inside doors were torn away, and the four sets of heavy iron doors within were pounded in with sledge hammers. The prisoner was found in bed, but was given time to dress. A rope was placed around his neck, and he was led out to a tree about 100 feet from the jail. The doomed man was asked if he had anything to say, and he replied that he had not, and they might go ahead. He was then drawn up and the rope securely fastened. At this point a guard, who had charge of a prisoner in the upper story of the court house, rang the bell to alarm the town. Some of the mob, to make sure of their work, shot Hamner in the back, the ball coming out near the left breast. About a hundred shots were then fired into the air and the mob disappeared in the darkness. There is practically no sympathy for the victim of the mob, who has long led a dissolute life.

Decoration Day Observance.

Decoration day was observed with unusual interest in many places, mostly under directions of the grand army of the republic. At Washington, in addition to the usual ceremonies at Arlington Heights, impressive ceremonies were held at the Soldiers' home, and in them Gen. W. T. Sherman, Postmaster General Gresham, Chief Justice Waite, Justice Stong, Generals Sturgis, Ayers, Ingalls and Rosecrans, Col. Batchelder and a number of ladies, wives and widows of prominent officers and detachments of regular troops participated together with the grand army posts. The exercises included prayer, music, reading of a poem by Consul Byers, author of the song Sherman's March to the Sea, and the delivery of an oration by ex-Justice William Strong of the United States supreme court. In New York the day was celebrated as never before. On the plaza on which were seated President Arthur, Secretary Chandler and Secretary Folger, Attorney General Brewster, Major General Hancock and staff. Mayor Edson, Brigadier-General Baron. Dr. Trobey and Gov. Ludlow, New Jersey, with Gen. Weston, Gen. Spencer and many others of prominence, who reviewed the procession. The procession was decidedly the largest seen in New York in many years. It was two hours and a quarter passing a given point, and presented an almost endless succession of changing colors and forms. Over 20,000 people visited Greenwood cemetery.

In St Paul, there was one of the longest and finest Decoration day processions that has been seen for many years. There were at least 2,000 men in line, and some place the number as high as 2,500. The police platoons at the head were in charge of Chief Weber and numbered thirty-four men, including two sergeants. The first division—military—was in command of Colonel Bend. The regulars in line were Companies I and F, Twenty-fifth infantry, and were accompanied by the Fort Snelling band. The battalion was in command of Col. Lawson, were also acted as captain of I company, Capt. Stivers being in command of F. company. There were forty men in each company. This detachment of regulars attracted great attention, the men, being colored and in fine discipline—companies C, D and E. M. N. G., which followed with the First Regiment band, turned out in good numbers, and for the first time upon parade the boys wore their new uniforms.

The second division included the two Grand Army posts, Garfield and Acker, which mustered together about eighty veterans. Between the two posts was a carriage containing the decorating committee—eighteen young ladies, daughters of ex-soldiers, dressed in red, white and blue, and wearing liberty caps. The Catholic societies forming the body of the third division turned out in very full ranks and made an excellent appearance.

At least 5,000 people were at Oakland cemetery. The ceremonies were as usual on such occasions.

In Minneapolis there was also a grand procession of military and civic organizations, and a very superior address from Hon. C. R. Benton.

Decoration day was observed in Stillwater in the usual manner, save that the annual address, which has heretofore been given at Fairview cemetery, was delivered at South Stillwater by R. Riddell, a Baptist preacher of St. Paul, known as the boy major, having attained that rank before he was twenty-one.

In all other large towns in the northwest, from which reports have come, the day was appropriately observed.

A Bad Place for Robbers.

At Fremont, Neb., Thursday morning Sheriff Gregg and his assistant, S. Morse, attempted to arrest two desperadoes about whom he had received a telephone message from Arlington station. When commanded to halt one of them instantly fired and shot Morse in the mouth, inflicting a dangerous but not fatal wound.

The desperadoes were pursued by Sheriff Gregg, who kept firing at them. They ran into a field where a man was plowing, and seizing his horses and unhitching them, they rode off across the Platte river bridge to an island, where they took the harnesses off the horses and rode east through the brush. Sheriff Gregg and John Lee, following in close pursuit, tracked them to the foot of the island, where they found a boat, into which they jumped and started down the river. At the same time their pursuers fired on them, and Gregg with his rifle hit one of them in the neck, killing him instantly.

The other surrendered without resistance, as he had no weapons. He gave his name as George Swain. His captors at first concluded to kill him on the spot, but changed their minds and brought him into town, where they were met by a large crowd, who were determined to hang the prisoner. Judge Murray, Mayor Freeland and other leading citizens counselled them against it, and succeeded in keeping them back for a few minutes, thus giving time for the prisoners to be rushed into jail. The latter bore himself with great nerve throughout. The body of the dead desperado was found and brought into town. He was the one who did the shooting. The two men were suspected of robbing, or attemping to rob, a bank at Lyons, Neb., recently, also of robbing the residence of Hon. Lorenzo Crounze at Calhoun Saturday night, where they secured $400 in money and a lot of jewelry. They were also suspected of attempting to rob the depot at Blair, where they bored a hole in the safe, but failed to open it. Mr. Morse, who was wounded, is a prominent citizen of Fremont.

The Cleveland Millionaire's Will.

1 Amasa Stone's will was made public last Saturday. He sets apart for his wife the Euclid avenue homestead and $5,000,000, from which she shall receive $25,000 annually during her life, and when she dies the property goes to his daughters and their husband's. It also bequeathes his daughters, Mrs. John Hay and Mrs. Samuel Matther, $600,000 each. To his sister, Mrs. Burgess, to Liberty and Andrew B. Stone, his brothers, and his wife's sister, Wilther M. Moore, $7,000; to his nephew, A. G. Stone, $10,000; to eighteen nephews and nieces, $5,000 each; to Mrs. Rebecca Blood and her husband, $12,000: to his coachman and gardener, house and lot to each; to Adelbert college, if the estate reaches $3,500,000, $100,000; to the home for aged women, $10,000; to the Children's Aid society, $10,000. The residue of the estate goes to his daughters, their husbands, and their heirs, share and share alike. It is stipulated that no inventory or apprisal of his estate shall be made or any property sold at public sale.

I Don't Believe It.

Said a scabby dyspeptic to a friend who had just told him that Dr. Guysott's Yellow Dock and Sarsaparilla was a permanent cure for dyspepsia—"I don't believe it," and the crabby dyspeptic continues to enjoy the horrible comfort that his dyspepsia gives him. Dr. Guysott's remedy is a permanent cure for dyspepsia. It strengthens the digestive organs most wonderfully.

Murder in a Logging Camp.

Duluth Special: On the St. Louis river, about twenty miles above Cloquet, John Wagner and Alex Brotherton, logsmen, working for the C. N. Nelson lumber company, became involved in a quarrel over the rolling of logs. The latter called the former a fool, when Wagner struck him on the head with a pevy, mashing in the skull. Brotherton has been unconscious nearly all the time since. His physician has removed a piece of skull bone of the size of a twenty-cent piece. Brotherton cannot live. Wagner was brought to Duluth Friday and committed to jail, and the hearing set for the 7th inst. Brotherton lives in Cloquet, is thirty-two years of age, and has a wife. Wagner is a single man, aged thirty-one, and formerly lived at Stillwater.

FARMERS' COLUMN.

The Short Rows.

Go over the strawberry plants set this spring and cut off every flower. The fruit borne by such plants would not amount to much, while they would interfere greatly with the vigorous growth necessary to a full crop next year.

It is said that the increased American demand for the popular polled cattle is tempting foreign breeders of Aberdeen-Angus and Galloways to retain too many of the male calves, a fact which renders necessary extra care in selection on the part of importers.

An experienced butcher is quoted by The Prairie Farmer as authority for the statement that if the following "Secret About Mutton" is strictly observed 'even the meat of the merino" will be "really good": Let the sheep have no food for at least twenty-four hours before slaughtering, and be careful to keep the woolly side of the skin from contact with the carcass.

It is as great a mistake for a farmer to starve his steer for two years and make beef of him the third year, as it would be for the manufacturer of leather to keep his hides in weak liquor two years, and make it into leather the third. In both cases there is two years of unproductive capital. Better crowd the feed and the tan into one year.

A hen may be calculated to consume one bushel of corn yearly, and to lay ten dozen or fifteen pounds of eggs. This is equivalent to saying that three and one-tenth pounds of corn will produce, when fed to a hen, five sixths of a pound of eggs; but five sixths of a pound of pork requires about five pounds of corn for its production. Taking into account the nutriment in each and the comparative prices of the two on an average, the pork is about three times as costly a food as the eggs, while it is certainly less healthful.

The scientific American says that when a tool gives out in using, or a machine breaks down, the user and owner does not console himself with the reflection that he "got it cheap," but he extricates the maker as heartily as though he had paid the highest market price; and he goes no more to the low-priced manufacturer, neither does he recommend his productions. We are running "cheapness" in to the ground, and the day has come when high prices do not repel provident people as first-class workmanship attracts.

The Husband's Part.

The home ought to be a harbor of rest; but if the wife ought to make it so for the husband, none the less ought the husband to make it so for the wife. If she should greet him with a restful presence, he should bring to her a cheerful one. The man who holds his umbrella over himself and leaves his wife to take the drippings is a boor; but that is what not a few of us husbands do in running under shelter from all household cares and leaving our wives to take the pitiless rain of pelting perplexities. It is said of Gov. Jewell that when he was carrying on his shoulders the burdens of a great business, and all the political anxieties of a great presidential campaign, he always brought to his home a bright face and a cheery word, and a seemingly light heart; so that care flew out of the window when he entered the door. In this, as in all other phases of life, unselfishness is the truest and best service of self. The man who takes best care of his wife finds in that very act the best refuge from the stinging cares of his own business. The wife ought always to feel the load lifted off her shoulders when her husband crosses the threshold in the evening. But she does not always. Sometimes it even settles heavier on her shoulders than before. What say you, gentlemen?—Laicus in Christian Union.

The Cheapest Food Used as a Luxury.

There is no arguing upon taste, as what may be found most palatable to one person may be little relished by another. To my own liking Ayrshire milk is the most palatable of all milks, but Jersey cream is more palatable to me than Ayrshire milk, and I prefer a Jersey cream thinned with milk to anything in the milk line. One meal a day I make upon crackers and cream, and myself and family find milk one of the most satisfactory of foods. When we regard cheapness, palatability and completeness of nutriment, milk stands pre-eminent among foods, and its consumption could profitably and pleasurably be increased five-fold. While supplying a New England village with milk some years ago—a village of well-to-do people—my surprise was great to find that the average consumption was just one pint daily to a family, a quantity less than is consumed by one in my own family. But to the public milk seems to hold the phenomenal position of the cheapest of foods used as a luxury.—Dr. Sturtevant.

Good Horses.

"If we are to have good horses we must take pains in breeding them," said a farmer to me a short time ago, while we were scanning the points of his good-sized two-year-old. "One fault of our farmers is that they don't take pains enough in breeding from good mares There is not generally so much fault with the males; not so much as there was 15 or 20 years ago, but there is a chance for much greater improvement on the other side. Farmers are too apt to think if the old mare has got past labor from age, infirmities or disease, for which there is no cure in horse-flesh why, she will do to raise a colt from. But one thing is certain," continued my friend, "as long as the spring remains unclean it is foolish to expect clean water from it."

But little reflection is needed to confirm the correctness of this reasoning. In order to work to any advantage in the improvement of our horses, the mares bred from must be free from acquired as well as constitutional or hereditary defects. One of the most important considerations in the brood mare is freedom from constitutional diseases.

It is, however, a well established fact that many of the acquired disease to which horses are subject, afterward become hereditary and descend from parent to progeny. Curbs, spavins, ringbones, heaves and the long list of defects to which every horse is liable from improper and hard usage, often become constitutional and inherent in the blood of dams, and their progeny are liable to become inoculated in the germ to the most distant posterity.

To the miserable practice of breeding from mares which too often come into the category of "those unfit for work, hence will do to breed from," is due in part the existence of the vast number of unsound horses which are to be found on nearly every farm, and which are heard wheezng and coughing at the hitching-posts about the corner groceries.

A Good Record for Farmers.

There is a general discontent among farmers' sons. They dislike the plodding work of the farm, and long for the larger life of the city, for the quicker returns and prospective wealth promised in manufactures and commerce. But they forget that there are always "castles in Spain," and that in business only the few draw prizes, while the many draw blanks. They overlook the fact that a large majority of business men fail, while every farmer who uses his brains as well as his hands earns a comfortable living.

A fact told by the late Dr. Chadbourne president of the agricultural college at Amherst, Mass., is worth also of considering by the sons of farmers. He was an enthusiast in advocating the value of brain and knowledge to the farmer, and insisting that farming communities were freer from vicious tendencies than cities.

In one of his visits, as a commissioner of prisons, to the reform school at Westboro, he asked the superintendent how many of the boys came from farmers' families. To his great delight the answer corresponded to his own convictions. After a careful investigation, the superintendent found that not a single boy in the whole company had come from a farm, or was the son of a farmer.

This is a good record for farmers, and a good reason why boys should hold to the farm. Agricultural life is free from the temptations common to city homes.

Hanging-Baskets.

Not every one can have a flower-garden but every one can have a hanging-basket, in summer time at least. The bringing of one into some flowerless home is often the beginning of a life-long love for flowers, the more association of which with daily duties is a refining influence, and the more there is done to make their culture universal the better. Hanging-baskets can be bought of any florist at prices ranging from $1 to $5 each, according to size and kind, and the varieties of plants in them, from the common wire basket to the rustic and the fancy earthen ware hanging pot. The wire and rustic baskets are the favorites, those made of wire and being best as far as the growing of plants is concerned. In them plants seem to thrive best.

Some earthenware baskets are handsome, being decorated with vines and medallions in relief, and generally tastefully painted. They are also made in the form of small logs of wood of various sizes; the appearance of a log is so well imitated that most persons at first think they are really sections of logs hollowed out and filled with soil and plants. Plants will grow as well in a wire ox-muzzle, flattened out a little, as in the most costly rustic or earthenware baskets; however, the wire baskets made for the purpose are neater than ox-muzzles, and as they have the handles already on many prefer them.

Those having baskets that have been filled often attempt to fill them themselves and generally make mistakes. Florists will fill empty baskets for a moderate price, using their own experience and taste in putting in the proper plants. In most floral catalogues the basket plants are designated, or there is a separate list. Line the basket neatly with moss, the thinnest kind is best; put in the soil, which should be fine and rich, push and pack it into the moss and the basket is ready to fill.

Put a plant of German or English ivy or some other fine-leaved vine at each wire or chain; place a lobelia and a moss-pink, a Kenilworth ivy, in the centre put a coleus, a fancy leaved geranium or a centaurea, better known as "dusty miller," with an artillery plant and a saxifraga (beefsteak or strawberry geranium), either the plain green variety or the variegated white, green and light pink one, on each side of the centre plant then put in two or three cuttings of tradescanthia, of which there are now several varieties, green, green and bronze, green and white and T. multicolor, the latest, prettily variegated green, white and pink; the last, though very handsome, is not so strong a grower as the others, and has a tendancy to run back to older varieties.

The plants named will fill the basket; give it a good watering and place it in a cool shady place for a day or two before hanging up. The above hints will do as well for rustic and earthenware baskets as for wire ones; but before filling them see that there are holes in the bottom for drainage. If there should not be, as often is the case, make them in some way. The rustic baskets in particular are often manufactured without holes for drainage. Hanging-baskets should not be hung where they will get continual sunshine. Keep them in at least partial shade, and water whenever dry; nearly every day, The wire baskets once a week or oftener should be taken down and put in a pail or tub of water and given a five minutes' soak.

Among plants suitable for baskets, not mentioned above, are sweet alyssum, particularly the varigated variety; gnaphalium, with downy white leaves; gazania, the flowers of which are orange and black; the smaller growing varieties of ferns; var. ice plant; Othonna crassifolia; trop volums and variegated grasses; panicumolar. is about the best of the latter; coccoloba, achyranthus, cineraria maritima, the variegated trailing vinca, and others. The rex class of begonias, with their beautiful marked leaves, do well in baskets, as do the flowering class. Glaucophylla scandens is a variety with a drooping habit, waxy light green leaves and orange salmon flowers; it does well in a basket by itself. The begonias, however, must have shade, heat and moisture, the first two in large supply, to be grown successfully.—F. W. Harold, Kingston, Md.—N. Y. Tribune.

Fun for the Dyspeptic.

The report that Mr. Gladstone will visit America is Premier tour.—The Drummer.

"Pa, I wish you would buy me a little pony," said Johnny. "I haven't got any money to buy you a pony, my son. You should go to school regularly, my son, study hard, and become a smart man, and some of these days, when you grow up, you will have money of your own to buy ponies with." "Then, I suppose, pa, you didn't study much when you were a little boy like me, or else you would have money now to buy ponies with, wouldn't you, pa?"—Texas Siftings

THE OLDEST MEDICINE IN THE WORLD, IS probably DR. ISAAC THOMPSON'S CELEBRATED EYE WATER. This article is a carefully prepared physician's prescription and has been in constant use for nearly a century, and notwithstanding the many other preparations that have been introduced into the market, the sale of this article is constantly increasing. If the directions are followed, it will never fail. We particularly invite the attention of physicians to its merits.

JOHN L. THOMPSON, SONS & CO., Troy, N. Y.

FROM THE OLD WORLD.

From the great London (Eng.) Times.

Among the many specifics introduced to the public for the cure of dyspepsia, indigestion, derangements of various kinds, and as a general family medicine, none have met with such genuine appreciation as Hop Bitters. Introduced to this country but a comparatively short time since, to meet the great demand for a pure, safe and perfect family medicine, they have rapidly increased in favor, until they are, without question, the most popular and valuable medicine known. Its world-wide renown is not due to the advertising it has received; it is famous by reason of its inherent virtues. It does all that is claimed for it. It discharges its curative powers without any of the evil effects of other bitters or medicine, being perfectly safe and harmless for the most frail woman, smallest child, and weakest invalid to use. Few are the homes indeed where the great discovery has not already been hailed as a deliverer and welcomed as a friend. It does what others affect to do. Composed of simple materials, it is a marvel of delicate and successful combination. Nothing is wanting. Every ingredient goes straight to the mark at which it is aimed, and never fails. Pleasant to the palate, agreeable to the stomach, and thoroughly effective as a cure, it has won for itself the confidence of all.—Times, London, Eng.

A Few Unsolicited Letters From Thousands Received.

Feb. 9, 1882.

I have tried experiments on myself and others with Hop Bitters, and can easily recommend them as a pleasant and efficacious medicine. I have found them specially useful in cases of congestion of the kidneys, as well as in bilious derangements.

REV. J. MILNER, M. A., Rector to the Duke of Edinburgh.

U. S. Consulate, MANCHESTER, ENG., Nov. 8, 1882.

Gentlemen:—Since writing you of the great benefit I had derived from taking "Hop Bitters," I gave a friend a bottle, who has been suffering much from dyspepsia and sluggish liver, and the change was marvelous; he appeared another being altogether. He had tried several other remedies without any benefit. I could name over a dozen other miraculous cures. ARTHUR C. HALL, Consular Clerk.

LONDON, ENG., Sept. 1, 1882.

I am pleased to testify to the good effects of your "Hop Bitters." Have been suffering a long time with severe pain in the left side and across the loins, and, having tried a number of so-called remedies without any benefit, I am glad to acknowledge the great relief I have obtained from your medicine. CHARLES WATSON.

COLCHESTER, ENG., Aug. 18, 1882.

Gentlemen:—I was troubled with a very bad form of indigestion for a long time, and tried many things in vain until I got some "Hop Bitters," and on taking was quite cured, and remain so till this time. It is now three months ago since I was bad. F. BELL.

From Rev. J. C. BOYCE, M. A. Oct. 30, 1882.

Dear Sirs:—I have lately finished my first bottle of "Hop Bitters." After having for many years suffered acutely from rheumatic gout (inherited) I feel so much better, and can walk so much more freely, should like to continue the use of it. I write to ask how many bottles you will let me have for £1, so that I may always have some in stock.

From Ould Ireland.

Hop Bitters Co., DUBLIN, Nov. 22, 1882.

Gentlemen:—You may be interested to learn that one of the most eminent judges on the Irish bench (a customer of mine) highly approves of your Hop Bitters, having received great benefit from their use. T. T. HOLMES, Chemist.

ALEXANDRIA PALACE, LONDON, ENG., April 18, 1882.

I find Hop Bitters a most wonderful medical combination, healthful, blood-purifying and strengthening. I can from analysis, as well as from medical knowledge, highly recommend them as a valuable family medicine. BARBARA WALLACE GOTHARD, Supt.

LONDON, ENG., Feb. 1, 1882.

Gentlemen:—For years I have been a sufferer from kidney complaint, and from using your Hop Bitters am entirely cured, and can recommend them to all suffering from such disease. WILLIAM HARRIS.

SHEFFIELD, Eng., June 7, 1882.

Sir:—Having suffered from extreme nervous debility for four years, and having tried all kinds of medicine and change of scene and air without deriving any benefit whatever, I was persuaded by a friend to try Hop Bitters, and the effect, I am happy to say, was most marvelous. Under these circumstances I feel it my duty to give this testimonial for the benefit of others, as I may say I am now entirely well; therefore I can justly and with confidence give personal testimony to any one wishing to call upon me. Yours truly, HENRY HALL.

NORWICH, Eng., June 20, 1882.

To the Hop Bitters Co.

Gentlemen:—Having suffered for many years from biliousness, accompanied with sickness and dreadful headache (being greatly fatigued with overwork and long hours at business), I lost all energy, strength and appetite. I was advised by a friend in whom I had seen such beneficial effects to try Hop Bitters, and a few bottles have quite altered and restored me to better health than ever. I have also recommended it to other friends, and am pleased to add with the like result. Every claim you make for it I can fully endorse, and recommend it as an incomparable tonic. Yours faithfully, S. W. FITT.

From Germany.

KATZENBACHHOF, Germany, Aug. 28, 1881.

Hop Bitters Co.

Dear Sirs:—I have taken your most precious essence, Hop Bitters—and I can already, after so short a time, assure you that I feel much better than I have felt for months.

I have had, during the course of four years, three times an inflammation of the kidneys. The last, in January, 1880, was the worst; and I took a lot of medicine to cure the same, in consequence of which my stomach got terribly weakened. I suffered from enormous pains, had to bear great torments when taking nourishment, had sleepless nights, but none of the medicine was of the least use to me. Now, in consequence of taking Hop Bitters, these pains and inconveniences have entirely left me, I have a good night's rest, and am sufficiently strengthened for work, while I always had to lay down during the day, and this almost every hour. I shall think it my duty to recommend the bitters to all who suffer, for I am sure I cannot thank the Lord enough that I came across your preparation, and I hope He will maintain you a long time to come for the welfare of suffering mankind. Yours very truly, PAULINE HAUSSLER, Gebr. Rosler.

From Portugal and Spain.

Gentlemen:—Though not in the habit of praising patent medicines, which for the most part are not only useless but injurious, I have constantly used Hop Bitters for the past four years in cases of indigestion, debility, feebleness of constitution, and in all diseases caused by poor or bad ventilation, want of air and exercise, overwork and want of appetite, with the most perfect success.

I am the first who introduced your Hop Bitters in Portugal and Spain, where they are now used very extensively. Yours very truly, BARON DE FONTE BELLA. Professeur de Chemie et de Pharmacie, Coimbra University, Coimbra, Portugal.

Facetious Items.

At a wedding at a village church near Stafford, in England, the officiating clergyman was about to perform the ceremony, when, chancing to glance upward, he noticed in the gallery several persons wearing billycock-shaped hats. Addressing them, he said: "Gentlemen, remove your hats." There was no response. The request was repeated again and again, and not, peing complied with, the clergyman, in a great heat ordered the clerk of the church to ascertain the names of the offenders. Before he got there a lady in the congregation rose and informed the minister, amid laughter, that the persons were ladies wearing gentlemen's hats. The ceremony was then proceeded with.

A fit-for-a-wife young girl.

A sought-everywhere young girl;
A future-most-fair young girl;
An ever-discreet,
We too seldom meet,
The queen among queens young girl.

MISS IDA B. McNAMARA.

BY DR. ALBERT GOULD.

For the Yankee Blade.

"Who is that young lady?"

"A new arrival." (Quizzically spoken).

"Good-looking, by Jove!"

"Handsome, that's a fact!"

"Not very stylish, though."

"Dresses elegantly, don't she?"

"Clothes rich enough—but not 'way up in style."

This was a conversation between some loungers on the piazza of a country hotel, in a little village not far from the White Mountains. The subject of these remarks was a young woman who had just alighted from the stage, and now entered the hotel. She was slender and gracefully formed, and displayed dignity and refinement in her manner.

Henry Stadt, an artist, seated at the end of the piazza, enjoying his usual afternoon smoke, listened complacently to the above remarks, and cast a glance in the direction of the fair unknown.

"Confounded puppies," he thought, "how everybody has to undergo their senseless criticism!"

One of them addressed him:

"Know her, Stadt?"

"Oh, yes, certainly!"

"Who is she?"

"A New York banker's daughter!"

"Can't be possible?"

"Well, if you are posted better than I am—why do you ask?"

"Beg pardon,—so surprised, you know! Why don't she wear something—something characteristic?"

"She does not care to make a walking advertisement of her social position."

"Ah, I tumble to it! Eccentric, eh?"

"Not exactly—plain and straightforward, like a Quaker."

This was above the dude's comprehension. He was only a third class dude, anyway.

The conversation ceased.

Stadt yawned, threw away his cigar, and walked down the street toward the village post-office; and these were his thoughts:

"You are welcome to that information! As for the girl, I don't know, or care who she may be; she does look forlorn enough; and I guess I have paved the way for her to become quite a center of attraction for awhile. Confound these brainless loafers, I like to answer their anxious inquiries now and then." Stadt was gifted with an extra stock of good sense, and, moreover, loved a little practical joke. The new name on the hotel register read: "Miss Ida B. McNamara, New York City." Stadt himself was surprised when he looked over the register that evening.

"The deuce!" he ejaculated, half-aloud. "I wonder if she is a banker's daughter." He looked over a New York directory, and what should he find among the McNamaras but one Herbert, a banker, residence——th street.

"I believe I am getting interested in this, myself," he thought, "and when I have a favorable opportunity, I will find out Miss McNamara's residence and see if the last part of my random shot hits as well as the first."

That night his sleep was disturbed by visions of banker's daughters disguised in the most outrageous costumes and surrounded by dudes.

The next morning Miss McNamara did not put in an appearance at the breakfast table until quite late. She was quite pale and evidently not quite rested from her long journey.

Stadt found himself one of the number who tarried long at the table. It was rather unusual for him to take interest in anybody unless a model, or a purchaser of one of his paintings.

The young stranger sat quietly opposite him, seemingly taking notice of no one, but quietly finishing her high repast. This done, she glided gracefully from the room. Stadt had an opportunity to study her face.

That morning a picnic party was planned. The objective point was a beautiful lake in the vicinity.

"The compliments of the Springlake House picnic party (this present date), to Miss McNamara, and would she join them in an excursion to the lake?"

"Miss McNamara's thanks to the members of the Springlake house picnic party, and she accepts their invitation with pleasure."

An hour later and the teams were ready, and Miss McNamara attired simply but with exquisite taste. After an introduction to the various members of the party—she took her place in one of the excursion wagons, seating herself beside one of the young ladies to whom she had just been introduced. It was a merry party the new comer had joined, and she proved herself quite an acquisition; although not so bolsterous as some of the more exuberant spirits, she made herself quite a favorite.

At the picnic grounds the teams stopped, and they all alighted.

It was a beautiful day in summer; there was a light breeze, and in the shade of the old trees on the shores of the lake it was delightfully cool. There were rude tables, built on rough boards, in a grove near by, purposely for the use of parties of excursionists. Hither the provisions, etc., were conveyed by the young men who came from the hotel with the boarders, and whose business it was to be everybody's right-hand man on such occasions. As the present excursion party numbered but fifteen, all told, his labors were not very irksome.

There was a large sail-boat near at hand, and the first pleasure proposed was a sail on the lake. This occupied the time until eleven o'clock. The next hour was taken up in preparing for an open air feast, and in putting up hammocks, and a swing.

After dinner the time was to be improved as each one preferred. There were the swing, the hammocks, walks to be enjoyed along the shady shores of the lake, and cosy nooks—where those who chose could sit and read or talk, or gaze upon the charming landscape.

"This is your first visit to Springlake, I believe, Miss McNamara?"

"It is," she replied.

"Charming bits of scenery in this locality."

"I have already realized that."

"Do you take pleasure in a beautiful landscape?"

"I do, indeed. But at first, I am most delighted by the bracing, invigorating air. So different from the city at this season."

"May I inquire if you have relatives who are to join you latter in the season?"

"Certainly you may. I cannot, however, answer decidedly. I preferred a quiet, retired country place, for rest and recreation. The merest whim brought me to this place. I came alone, and perhaps shall remain here through the season. I may join my friends elsewhere."

"I speak for myself—and I think I am expressing the opinion of the rest of our little company—when I say we consider you a happy and agreeable addition to our number."

"And I am charmed by every one I have become acquainted with here They all seem pleasant people."

"Your name seems familiar to me. I once had occasion to transact some business with a banker in the city, whose name was Herbert McNamara. He resided at No.——th street."

She looked at him sharply for a moment.

"That is my father's name."

Just then some one came and claimed Miss McNamara's attention and the conversation came to an end.

"I wonder whether I coined a lie or issued sterling truth, this time; I shouldn't wonder if it were proved that I did transact business with her father." Thus thought the perplexed Stadt.

At half past three o'clock they returned to the hotel. After the evening meal Miss McNamara sat in her room cogitating thus:

"So far, so good! Everything has gone better than I had planned. I would like to know how the story originated in regard to my being an heiress. Never mind! it is so much in my favor Now, Mr. Artist, I will give you a subject to think of next winter, if fortune still favors me."

When she had prepared herself for an evening ride, she came down from her room and, accompanied by the young lady who shared her seat with her in the morning and by a gentleman of the party rode away.

Stadt, who had anticipated an evening chat with her, was for once disappointed. For the first time in his life he experienced a twinge of jealousy.

The next day the "boarders," as the country folks styled them, were each one for himself or herself in particular, and St. Nick might take anybody else. Yesterday it was "united, we stand; divided, we fall." To-day everybody seceded and became an earnest advocate of individual rights. The artist was fast losing his senses.

Stadt with his amateur photographic apparatus was after subjects for future paintings, and hoping to meet India.

The fair India was ensconced in a shady, retired nook, perusing a magazine. Some of the party were taking it easy in their rooms; one had gone to ride, another for a walk, and so on.

It was an uncomfortably warm day. The thermometer stood at 94 degrees in the shade. Stadt commenced early in the morning with a picture of a barefoot boy driving the cows to the pasture, and finished at half-past eleven with an old mill, and—a dam.

Returning to the hotel by a short cut through the forest, he surprised Miss McNamara in her shady retreat.

She looked up quickly, startled by his sudden appearance.

"You are a sensible person," he said.

"Why?"

"Because you know enough to keep cool!"

"Here I have been," he continued, "prancing about in the heat, pretending to admire nature, and striving to fix her varied charms in a convenient and permanent form; really I feel as though I had been canning lobsters for the grocery trade."

"H'm! High art, Mr. Stadt!"

"High Mercury!"

"Do you never have any moment when your soul fires with the poetry of your noble calling?"

"Not often in July, Miss McNamara."

"I believe you must be a brute!" This was said with a saucy glance.

"I believe I am! a long eared brute!"

"Why long-eared, horrible artist?"

"Because, if you will have it—"

"Why?"

"Because I am in love, I believe!"

"Oh!"

"It is something new to me!"

"They say it is to every one."

"But I have been cynical."

"What a great big word!"

"It comes from the Greek, and means like a dog."

"Come here, good fellow! I like dogs!"

"I thought last evening you seemed to like puppies!"

"You are a brute."

"And you say you like brutes?"

"Not in human form!"

"Then I am not your poodle!"

"Mr. Stadt!"

"You put the words in my mouth!"

"Then I forgive you."

"And accept me as your dog?" This was said with an earnest meaning glance. Stadt was peculiar, and chose this line of making a demonstration, because he could advance in earnest, or retreat under the cover of a jest.

She understood his glance and blushed. "I think we'd better return to the hotel."

"Not till my question is answered, please!"

"Be it as you will, then!"

She curved her slender neck gracefully and rested her head on his shoulder.

His lips met hers in a long continued kiss.

"But, Mr. Stadt—"

"Call me Henry, my darling!"

"Well, Henry, my darling," she said, roguishly adding a little more than he intended to have her do; but he thought it sounded very nice just then, "I did not know that artists wooed after this fashion!"

"Well, my dear Ida, the artists do not woo after this fashion!—This is the way they win!"

"Oh!"

They came back to the hotel looking very, very happy, and quite unconscious that the thermometer recorded 98 degrees in the shade.

This was all very nice, and is not the first instance of an engagement almost at sight. When it was decided at the hotel how matters were, a decided sensation was produced. And although the above conversation was a secret, Henry Stadt was called a "lucky dog!" Whereat he smiled.

One day while conversing with the fair Ida, a thought suggested itself to Henry Statd, and in his comical way he asked:

"Does your father like dogs?"

She laughed, a little silvery laugh, and then paused and seemed perplexed.

"I have been thinking of something similar, but not in that horrid way. Please don't refer to our little scene, in that manner again. I am almost sorry we commenced in jest."

"Never mind—bad beginnings make good endings—we ended in earnest."

"It is so singular—our affair I mean—that I hardly know how to arrange it with papa. He is as peculiar as his daughter; and I fear if I am to abrupt in breaking the news, our cherished hopes will fall to the ground. Trust to me, my darling, and I will find a way ere long, and will overcome this difficulty."

"I do trust to you, my beloved Ida, and life opens up new avenues of hope and joy."

"Hitherto," he continued, "my life has been more a farce than a reality. I have not realized its true depths. I have never loved, and love is the great sunshine of life. I think this sunshine will hereafter be seen in my paintings. Its indescribable light shall be interwoven with all I undertake to perform."

"Now you speak like my own, noble, true-hearted artist! I am proud of you, and I am proud, too, that my own humble self may have such an influence upon your future."

Noiselessly, one of the "dudes," who was sitting on the other side (i. e., the inside) of the closed blinds of the windows that opened on the piazza, arose, looked pale and sick; quietly he stole up the broad, carpeted stairs, and entered his room, fell on the bed vomiting—in a state of collapse—his last words were, "Oh, God!" Noiselessly, too, his companion, arose and went out through the kitchen; "out, out into the wide world;" whither he went, was never known! The servant girl said his last despairing cry was for a studio and a paint-pot—if she heard aright. He was gone half-an-hour.

Two weeks passed happily away. The lovers were the constant subjects of varied remarks, both flattering and disparaging.

One day a letter was received by Ida McNamara which filled her with distress and alarm. In her trouble she sought her faithful lover, and unbosomed to him the secret of her distress in this wise:

"Henry, O my darling! What shall I do? What shall I do?"

She moaned, and wrung her dainty, lily-white hands in perfect agony.

"What is it, Ida? Speak, my love, and relieve my anxiety! I will do all in my power to aid you. What is it? What can it be?

"O, you cannot aid me! I cannot tell you! What shall I do? O, Henry! help me! I shall die! I shall die!"

Stadt sprang to her side, kissed the pallid face, and caught her as she was falling like a lifeless thing to the floor. In her hand she still clutched the fatal letter—her fingers closed over it with a rigid, death-like grasp.

He laid her lifeless form upon the bed and sent one of the servants to summon a physician. When he arrived, he calmed Henry's fears, saying it was only a convulsion and she would soon recover.

The doctor gave her stimulants and Henry was soon rejoiced to see a faint color coming to her lips. Her eyes slowly unclosed and she looked up to him with a feeble smile of thanks for kindness. He printed a kiss on her pallid brow. As soon as they were left alone for a moment, she motioned him to read the letter. It ran as follows:—

No.—, —th St., New York City,
July 29th, 18—

MY DEAR DAUGHTER:—I have painful news to communicate. My affairs are such, that a failure in business seems inevitable. I have raised every penny that I can to tide me over the critical place; and I now lack two thousand dollars of the required amount. Ruin stares me in the face. I care less for myself than for my wife and child, and the poverty and disgrace with which they are threatened. Dear Ida, I cannot live to bear up under it. I shall sink beneath the load. There is but one short week and then the crash must come. You had better return to the city at once.

Your aff. father,
HERBERT MCNAMARA,

TO MISS IDA B. MCNAMARA,

"Is this all, my dear Ida? Then do not feel anxious any further. Here is our golden opportunity. I can now win your father's undying gratitude!"

"In what way, Henry?"

"I have just two thousand dollars laid by for a rainy day. I accumulated this sum from the sale of my pictures through a series of years. I will draw on the bank for that amount. I have what I intended to use this summer, over and above that amount. It will be as safe with your father, as where it is now. I said that I had met with him. I think, now, I was mistaken. Now what do you say? Shall I not go to him at once, and tell him of our engagement, and all? Are we not sure of his good will and blessing?"

Tears streamed down the fair girl's cheeks:

"Oh, Henry! how kind and noble you are!. If you only will do this, you will certainly have your reward. I could not live without you! No, I could not ever be parted from you in this world! How happy you make me."

"Then write to him to-night, and I will go to the city at once, and arrange it, and you will not need to return yet. I will come back with his blessing, and we will be happy all the long summer days here together. Next Christmas we will be married. Say yes—will you not my darling?"

And the happy little woman smiled, and rested her head on his manly breast and softly murmured, "Yes."

At the depot in the great city, one morning subsequent to this episode, a long-haired artist stepped off from the platform of one of the cars of an eastern inward train. He was met by a magnificent, portly old gentleman, who wrung his hand with noticeable warmth and energy.

"I received my daughter's letters last night, and she explained all. I am proud of you, my boy; and your generous action, at this crisis, has made an impression on my heart never effaced. I look forward with joy when I may call you my son!"

They went together to the bank, and in the twinkling of an eye the old man had his two thousand dollars in cash. Stadt, too happy to wait for further ceremony, declined an urgent invitation to dine with the old gentleman, and hastily bidding him adieu, took the very next eastern bound train, impatient to bear the news of his success back to Ida. He had seen tears of joy glisten in her father's eyes. What was his astonishment to find that a despatch had been received by her, during her absence, saying that a loved aunt was lying at the point of death. This dispatch was from Boston. A dainty white missive carefully sealed, and directed in Ida's own fair hand, was handed to him by the clerk of the hotel. He opened it and read:

SPRING LAKE HOUSE, AUG. 1.18—

MY ALMOST HUBBY:—Do not mourn my loss, there are many others nearly as good as I am. It will be useless for you to search for me, as you would not recognize me in male attire, (if you should see me,) unless by my sweet tenor voice. Thank you for your present. Just one thousand apiece for myself and partner. I expect I shall miss your love, and I may never find another like you. You had better take care of what you have left, and not buy that diamond ring. I have concluded to have a room all to myself next Christmas.

Your loving "wify," IDA.

TO HENRY STADT.

The next day a long-haired man was seen pitching an amateur photo, apparatus and about 75,000 choice views into the river! and for one week there was not a dram-soaked old toper in the city of W—, who could hold the same amount of liquor that Henry Stadt kept outside of. He was well hooped.

Ask him, some time, how his father-in-law's business flourishes!

The editors of Stockton, California, are having it on the gambling question, The Mail says of the editor of its contemporary: "A man who would whipsaw on ace and attempt to call the turn by putting (as we have often seen him) four dollars (his week's salary) on a card that was as dead as Thompson's colt, is hardly the person to discuss this great question intelligently." To this unkind cut the Herald says: "A man who would let his money (borrowed from us) lie on the jack until said jack has passed to the silent majority, and a drunken check-guerilla appropriates the swag, while the player, with his eyes on another man's bet, fondly supposes he was coppering the queen, enters this important argument considerably handicapped."

"I know it, boss; but my old hoss am weak, and I has jined de sciety for de perpetration of cruelty to animals, and it am agin my principle to put too heaby a load on pore ole hoss." "All right, Mose. I am glad you have got such a good heart. Do you want a dram?" The aged African worked his lips convulsively, and ejaculated: "Does I want a dram? Boss, I'se perishin' for a dram. Thank yer, boss; thank yer kindly for dat ar dram you am gwine ter gib me." "Not so fast, Uncle Mose. I merely asked you if you wanted a drink. Floating Fun.

When a young man says his girl is "worth her weight in gold" he is not putting a very high valuation upon her, unless she is a very heavy girl. At this rating 120 pounds of girl would be worth only about $30,000, and any young man who doesn't think his best girl worth more than $30,000 ought to be kicked clear over the front gate by an infuriated parent and have the dog set after him.—Middletown (Del.) A few weeks since the Emperor of Austria and the old King of Saxe wandered off on a shooting tour. They became tired and solicited permission to ride on a cart which a peasant was driving. When they reached their point one of the royal personage slipped a few coins into the old man's hand, and said: "I don't suppose you know who you have been carting?" "No, I don't," replied the man. "Well, this is the King of Saxe, and I am Francis Joseph." The old fellow, who took it as a joke, immediately responded: "I guess you don't know who has been driving you, do you?" "No," replied the emperor. "Well, I am the Shah of Persia," he added, with a twinkle in his eye.

The Effect of a Sunstroke.

Sherman W. Platt, of Newtown, was attacked with malaria last spring and when hardly recovered went out to help in the hay field. His mother thinks that he suffered sunstroke then, for he soon went into a semi-unconscious condition, in which he has since remained. He has not spoken since Christmas. Twice a day he rouses from what seems to be a sound slumber and in a half-dazed fashion leaves his chair to enter an adjoining room, where the family meals are served. He eats very little. Mrs. Platt thinks that his face is more bloated than formerly, but otherwise he remains unchanged. He is dressed and undressed like a baby. He was to have been married this spring, but does not recognize his intended bride when she calls, and no efforts have availed to arouse him from his stupor.—[Hartford (Conn.) Courant.

A DARK DAY.

Hetty Lockwood sat at the open window—a big basket of undarned stockings by her side, a new copy of the Ladies' Magazine on the table close by, while within reach a bright butterfly hovered about a newly opened honeysuckle growing against the window. The spring breeze breathed balmily into the apartment, filling her senses with a delicious dreaminess, and her eyes wandered wistfully out beyond the shaded village street to the green fields and budding willows bordering the sparkling river. On a morning such as this who could endure to stay in doors? Who could endure to sit quietly down and darn stockings?—boy's stockings, too, with great holes in the heels of them, which merely to look at, caused her a despairing sigh. Then the new magazine, how she longed to unfold the crisp sheets, luxuriate in its contents, like the butterfly in the sweets of the honeysuckle. But Hetty's life more resembled that of the bee than the butterfly. Though only eighteen, she was the eldest of seven children, mostly boys; and a goodly portion of the housework fell upon her shoulders. Her mother was a sharp bustling woman, and though without an idea of being unkind, often made her daughter's life irksome with distasteful tasks and wearisome confinements.

A glad, girlish voice aroused Hetty. Looking from the window she saw Susie Lake, one of her few intimate friends, leaning on the little front garden gate.

"Oh, Hetty, do come and walk with me down to Aunt Ellen's. The morning is just lovely; and I have something so particular to tell you."

"I am afraid I can't, Susie. It is Saturday, you know; and I am sewing and watching baby asleep, while mother is in the kitchen."

"Then I will have to tell you now, I suppose."

She came close under the window, and said in a lower voice and mischievous smile:

"Who do you think I saw just now, Hetty?"

"I don't know who. The new minister?"

"No, indeed; somebody very different from that fat, red-faced old codger," returned Susie, irreverently.

"Oh Susie, but who was it?"

"Now, it was just Mr. Walter Hayes Now, ain't you surprised?"

A vivid blush dyed Hetty's fair face. She made no reply and Susie continued:

"His employer, Mr. Mitchell, sent him on business from Philadelphia to C——, and as this wasn't much out of the way of his home, they gave him leave to stop here for a day or two, so he told me when I met him just now. He arrived only an hour ago, in the stage from Cox's station, and that is how I came to see him before you did, Hettie," she added laughingly.

She passed on, leaving Hetty with flushed cheeks, brightened eyes, and a heart thrilling with glad excitement. No wonder. For more than a year and a half past the thought of Walter Hayes had been the brightest spot of her life around which all sweet, vague thoughts, of happiness had clustered. One year ago he had stood at that same little green garden gate, in the moonlight, on their late return from the church concert, and bidding her good-by before going away to the great city to seek his fortune. She remembered how the warm, lingering clasp of his hand had thrilled her, and how he had said at last, in a voice that almost trembled—

"You must not forget me, Hetty. I shall think of you always, and when I come back—"

And just then her mother had come on the porch and called her in out of the damp air; and so he had left her reluctantly. But now he had come back, and she would see him to-day.

"I do declare, Hetty," exclaimed her mother, bustling into the room, warm and flushed from her pie-baking, "you are the laziest girl I ever saw, Here you've been upwards of an hour darning one pair of stockings! What have you been about? Dreaming away your time as usual, no doubt, and with all the children's Sunday clothes to look over and to lay out for to-morrow, besides the Saturday's chores."

Hetty penitently resumed her work; but she was very glad when, toward sunset, it was all done, and she had leisure to run up to her own little room; and never in her life she had taken such pains with her appearance as now, while she arrayed herself in what she considered her most becoming toilette, a soft dove-colored dress, with a knot of a rose-colored ribbon at her throat, and another nestling like a freshly bloomed rose in the ripples of her hair.

How anxiously she listened for the expected ring at the front door. How tumultuously her heart beat when at length it came, and how heavy it sank when old Deacon Brown stalked in to discuss some church matters with her father. Then she began to look at the clock, and her heart grew fainter and fainter as she saw it travelling slowly around to eight o'clock. In Riverside they kept early hours, and when, at a quarter of nine, Deacon Brown took leave, Hetty also arose, and lighting her bedroom candle, went slowly and sadly upstairs.

When, next morning, she came down, her mother remarked, as she busied herself about the breakfast table—

"Hetty, Walter Hayes was here last night."

"Oh, mother!"

There was something almost pathetic in the look and tone, but Mrs. Lockwood was too busy with the steaming coffee pot to perceive it.

"He came in just as you had gone upstairs," she continued. "He asked for you, but it was so late, I thought it hardly worth while to call you down again. He had been seeing Miss Mitchell home to her aunt's—that Philadelphia girl, you know, and I didn't know until he mentioned it, that she was a niece of his employer, Mr. Mitchell. He is certainly improved. To my mind, there is nothing like city life for giving people what they call style now. Make Eddie's milk tea, whilst I pour out the coffee.

"I think," observed Mr. Lockwood as he took his place at the table and cut into the cold corned beef, "I think I heard Harry Tunstall say yesterday that young Hayes was paying attention to Miss Mitchell. He said he had seen them together in Philadelphia. She's a handsome girl, and her father's got money. If Walter marries her he will do well—don't bolt your food like that, cut it properly, sir, before eating."

Hetty turned suddenly sick at heart She said nothing, but she could not swallow her breakfast, and her mother presently remarked upon her pale looks.

"Don't you feel well, child? I noticed that you were fidgetty and nervous last night. You're feverish, I doubt, with the spring weather."

It wasn't much like spring to-day. One of the sudden changes peculiar to the fickle month of April had taken place and a cold breeze and leaden clouds replaced the balmy airs and sunny skies of yesterday. It began to drizzle, too, as the family arose from the breakfast table, and a bleak and cheerless prospect was presented without.

Hetty was glad that her mother permitted her to go to her room and lie down. There was never a fire in her room; but she drew the bed clothes over her head and wished that she could thus shut herself out from the whole world. She felt forlorn and miserable. All her sweet foolish dreams of love seemed to have been rudely crushed at a blow. Walter had ceased to care for her. He had not been proof against a year's absence. He had been won from her by that handsome, stylish girl from Philadelphia; and Hetty hid her face in her pillow, and almost wished that she could die.

It was the darkest day she had ever known. She tried to read her Bible, but could not fix her thoughts on it, and closed it in despair. She listened to the dismal beat of the slow-falling rain, and at times watched the swaying of the half-budding tree branches in the chill wind. The cherry tree beneath her window had been yesterday whitening into blossom. Surely the cold would kill tender buds, and there would be no fruit. How like her own hopes and happiness.

Her mother sent for her to come down to dinner. There was, she said, no use in staying upstairs in the cold, and the child would be better by the fire with some nice warm soup. In there all the afternoon Hetty sat, while her father and the boys went to church—for it had ceased raining now—and her mother read "Baxter's Rise and Progress" and sang dismal hymns to the baby.

"Het," said Bill, upon his return from church, "I saw your old beau, Mr. Walt. Hayes, at church with Miss Mitchell, and he shook hands with me and asked how the family was. She's a real swell, a regular roarer, I tell you, and if you don't shine up some she'll cut you out."

"William, don't let me hear any more such slang talk from you, I beg," said his mother reprovingly.

"And Hetty," said her little sister Annie, as she carefully drew off and folded her gloves, "heard Kate Hayes tell Mrs. Green that Walter and Miss Mitchell were going back to-morrow to Philadelphia, and Mrs. Green said she supposed that was one reason of his coming to Riverside that he might travel home with her."

Hetty lost all heart and hope at this. She longed for sympathy—to lay her head on her mother's knee and tell her all. But Mrs. Lockwood, though she really loved her children, was not one of those gentle and sympathetic mothers to whom their children thus turn; and Hetty went again to her lonely room, and wrapping herself in a shawl, seated herself at the window and looked listlessly out.

A few people were passing. She hardly noticed them, until she suddenly met a pair of brown eyes, and a hat was lifted; and she drew back with burning cheeks and a beating heart, as Walter Hayes passed. How handsome he looked! and as her mother had observed, how improved in appearance—with so much of manliness and dignity. And she— what could he think of her, sitting there pale and forlorn-looking, with her hair all disordered about her face? He might come this evening, perhaps, and yet she hardly wished it know. It would only be painful to see him, and find him changed. Still, she dressed herself and went down stairs, though her head was throbbing and she felt really ill. And all the evening she waited and watched as she had done before; and Walter never came, and she knew now that he did not care to see her. And so ended the long, dreary day.

Next morning Hetty arose feverish and ill. But she busied herself about the household work; and when her mother observing only that she was dull and languid, remarked that she needed a walk, and desired her to carry a little jar of butter to old Mrs. Simpson, she made no objection. The day was pleasant though cool, and wrapping herself in a warm shawl of her mother's and tying a pink-lined hood over her face, Hetty set off alone on her walk.

It was rather a long distance that she had to go—out of the village and across a field, and then by a lonely pathway lying along the foot of a hill. Mrs. Simpson kept her some time talking, and it was late when the girl set out on her return.

Slowly retracing the little pathway under the drooping beeches, Hetty paused at the stile which led into the open field. It was pleasant here. The sun shed a golden light over the beech boughs, and a breath of spring-time woodland fragrance floated on the air. Somehow Hettie felt soothed as she stood resting on the stile, and looking dreamily at the white clouds overhead.

An approaching footstep startled her. Turning, she saw a man's figure coming along the pathway and another glance showed her it was Walter Hayes. Her heart gave a great throb and then seemed to stand still.

He came on straight toward her—his hand extended, his lips smiling, his eyes looked straight into her own.

"Hetty!"

She looked up at him, half in hope, half in doubt, and the color came and went on her face.

"Hetty—I have wanted so much to see you."

She could not mistake the sincerity of his tone, or the look of the brown eyes, and she answered simply and naively:

"I thought you had forgotten me."

"Forgotten you?"

She could not have told how it happened; but somehow she found herself seated on the step of the stile with Walter beside her, and her cheek close, ah! very close to his, whilst all the world around seemed transformed into a strange beauty and glory. Such miracles does a moment sometimes work in our lives.

As they walked slowly homeward together he told her that one thing and another had prevented his seeing her, among the rest Bill having confidentially informed him at church, in answer to his inquiries, that she was too sick to come down-stairs that day—a statement which he unfortunately credited, and when this morning he had called and learned from her mother where she had gone, he lost no time in following.

"But, Walter," said Hetty, hesitatingly, "do you know I heard something about you and—Miss Mitchell?"

He laughed.

"Miss Mitchell is to be married shortly, Hetty, to our junior partner. She has been very kind to me, and so has her uncle, my employer. Indeed, Hetty, I wanted to tell you of my good fortune and prospects, and to ask you, darling, if, when—"

And then the words which had for a whole year been delayed were spoken, and Hetty wondered, as she came in sight of her home, whether this could be the same world that it had been on that dark, dark day, yesterday.

Handy One-Armed Men.

He was a big man with heavy side whiskers and a military air that betokened long service under fire; and he was a one-armed man. The empty sleeve that hung at his right side told of glory sought and peril undergone. He was seated in an Eighth street restaurant, leisurely breakfasting and going through the motions of the meal with a graceful ease that betokened a man of high breeding.

"Never mind the knife and fork," he said, as the obsequious waiter placed those useful implements beside the savory steak that formed the basis of the meal: "I am already provided." So saying he drew from his pocket a small morocco case and removed from it an ivory handled instrument, highly polished, that looked strikingly surgical in its spotless brillancy. Opening this by the aid of his mouth, and his remaining hand he disclosed what proved to be a knife and fork combined. One side was a well sharpened knife, and at the ends were three broad prongs, that served well the purposes of a fork. The cutting of the steak was done gracefully and toroughly, and then his breakfast began.

By this time the writer, anxious to learn more of the devices of the one-armed man, took a seat at the same table and ordered his breakfast. His remarks on the ease and grace with which the veteran handled his conjoint knife and fork were well received and the one-armed man willingly explained some of the many devices that he and others maimed in the war resort to for self-service.

"This knife and fork,' he said, "were among the first inventions for one-armed men and have been in use for many years. But we have other devices not so generally known. For instance, when I wash my face and hand I have affixed to my basin a small brush, upon which I rub my soap and thus raise the necessary suds. When I want to cut my nails I stick a sharp knife into the table and pass them carefully around the edge of the blade. To tie my shoe in a bow-knot required long practice and ingenuity, but I can do it easily now. How I do I can not explain in words. For a long time I had great trouble in buttoning my collar, but now no button can resist me. I don't believe I swear half as much during the operation as most men who have two arms."

"Can you shave yourself?"

"Oh, yes. There is no difficulty about that. In fact, in the twenty years since Antietam, where I lost my arm, I have become almost perfect in all the little arts, requisite for comfort."—Philadelphia Times.

Personal Gossip.

A young lady in St. Louis became dissatisfied with her beautiful natural teeth because they were not just according to the latest fancy in teeth. She had a dentist take the upper ones out and make her a set. Her sweetheart was getting a set also, and the dentist gave him the natural ones he had taken from the jaws of his lady-love. They both thought it was an awfully cute thing. Swell people usually order their teeth made with some defect or a gold plug or two in them.

His old-fashioned and, as he says, now quite exploded notions of politeness prevented him from asserting himself with proper vigor and elbowing his way to a seat. He made way for the other passengers, who, deterred by no such obsolete scruples, used to jostle him about and thrust him aside without mercy till all the seats were taken. The conductors at last lost all respect for him and treated him without ceremony as a person wholly sans seriex. Their contempt and that of his fellow passengers was more than he could bear, so he renounced this mode of conveyance altogether.

THE SILVER LIGHT.

From morn till eve the clouds have dropped
Their gathered fullness down,
The wind has moaned in fitful gusts,
Through branches bare and brown.

No sunbeam breaks the sullen gloom
That reigns o'er earth and sky,
And day is drawing to a close,
The evening time is nigh.

But, as the daylight fades away
And Nature sinks to rest,
The clouds lift up; a silver light
Is gleaming in the west.

'Tis ever thus the threatening clouds
Have hid Life's smiling sun;
No cheering ray yet parts their gloom
And day is almost done.

Yet, when my evening time shall come,
Perhaps the clouds will rise,
And I the Silver Light shall see,
Gleam in the Western skies.

PHYL.

CHAPTER I.—THE COUNTRY MOUSE.

"Phyllis," said my stepmother, Mrs. Maria, looking up from the letter she was reading, with a tinge of excitement on her drab face, "my sister, Lady Janet Ponsonby, writes to say I may expect to see her any day this week; and I do hope, for all our sakes, you will tone down your appearance into something approaching decency."

"You will never alter Phyl, Maria," said my father, polishing his bald head impatiently, "so why can't you leave the girl in peace? Her appearance is a very pleasant one to her old father, isn't it, puss?" And the dear old man pinched my cheek affectionately.

"Fancy," he continued, "Janet coming to see us after all these years! Dear me! what a wonderfully pretty woman she used to be, with the neatest feet and ankle I ever saw! How time flies! why, she must be sixty. That reminds us, Maria, that we are getting old."

"Speak for yourself," I remark, laughingly; "Mrs. Maria cannot bear to be told of the fact that she is getting old and fat."

My stepmother remarks, looking out into the old-fashioned garden, where my pretty sister, in a bright morning dress, is busily tending her roses: "No need to beg Rosie to do us justice; she never fails us. I wish you were more like her, for your own sake as well as ours."

I answer hotly that "I would not be like my commonplace, weak-minded sister for all her beauty."

My father, sniffing war in the air, asks me to follow him, as soon as I can, to the surgery, to write some labels and roll some pills. "And," he continues, entreatingly, "if you don't mind, Phyl, I should be grateful if you would run into the village with a few bottles of medicine. That wretched errand-boy Bob has been fighting again with Frank, and has two such beautiful black eyes. When does that boy return to school, Maria? Soon, I hope, for all our sakes. He keeps the house in an uproar."

"Oh, don't say you wish Frank gone, dad," I say, for my stepbrother is the plague and pleasure of my life.

"Phyllis always encourages all his tricks," complains my stepmother; and seeing the deluge returning in the shape of tears, my father and I made our escape.

I am considered like my dear old dad, but, then, as Mrs. Maria says, "What makes a handsome man makes an ugly woman," and, catching sight of myself in the old green-shaded glass in the surgery, as I busily roll my pills, I confess she is not far wrong; for the glass shows me a tall, bony girl of twenty, with a sallow complexion, immense dark eyes, and a head running over with crisp, dark curls, giving me the appearance of a boy; a wide mouth, full of strong white teeth; and a pair of ill-tempered eyebrows. Added to this, I am attired in a plain dress of rough, dark serge, warranted not to show ink stains, and round my neck is a boy's plain turn-down linen collar.

My sister Rose is my direct opposite; a small, fairy-like creature all pink and white, a perfect bunch of roses, only she insipidly lacked their sweetness. She had always been my stepmother's favorite since she first came from her frosty spinsterhood to set my poor old dad's house to rights, and be its mistress, when Rose was a pretty doll of a child, easily managed through her very stupidity. I was then a tiresome, ugly, spoiled child of seven, with a fine high temper and a sharp shrewd tongue, and, therefore, the very bane of my stepmother's life. Unlike my more tractable sister, I would not call her mamma, but saucily named her Mrs. Maria, an appellation she bore, so far as I was concerned, from first to last.

I believe I should have loved my sister better had she not always been dangled before me as a model. As it was we were—well, nearly indifferent to each other; but my dear father and handsome unmanageable Frank I loved dearly.

A few days later, returning from a row on the river with Frank, I found seated in our parlor, as though she had been there all her life, cooed over by Rosie and admired from a distance by Mrs. Maria, Lady Janet Ponsonby, a handsome old lady, who looked every inch what she was, a high-bred woman of the world. "The Lady Jane was tall and slim, the Lady Jane was fair," and was dressed in somewhat too young a fashion, making the most of her well-preserved looks, for when can a woman forget that she has been beautiful?

She gazed at me through her gold-rimmed glasses; then remarked to Mrs. Maria, as though I were not present, "If this is the ugly duckling, 'pon my honor, she does not strike me as so plain as she has been painted; and were she not habited in a costume fashioned by a Goth, she might be made to look something better than a bathing-woman."

"Will your ladyship be good enough to remember I am in the flesh," I ask, "and not a figure from Tussaud's? If this is the breeding of the town mouse, give me that of the country."

With a little laugh, she answered, still toying with the annoying glasses. "To quote H. J. Byron, 'I like the girl, she is so jolly rude.'"

I could hardly help smiling at her coolness; so I threw off my hat, and, taking a book, sat down on the sofa to read. I started up again with a little scream, for a shrill voice close to my ear said, "Curse your impudence! dare to speak again!"

Turning round sharply, I beheld on the little table at my elbow, sheltered by the thick lace curtains, a gilded cage, and within it a rakish-looking parrot, who is regarding me attentively with one round, bright eye.

"Don't be startled," said Lady Janet, "it's only poor Poll, from whom I am never parted. She is a most amazing bird, her only failing being that at times her language is too pronounced for polite ears. You will soon get used to her, and not notice her naughty tongue."

That afternoon the rector's wife called to invoke our aid to assist at a fancy fair, and upon the good lady saying she had twisted her ankle over a stone, Polly shrieked out, "Served you right, thick head!" After that Polly was banished to her mistress' bed-room.

After the rector's wife had departed, Mrs. Maria begged hard that I would give up all idea of attending at the fancy fair. She was so urgent in her entreaties that her sister asked the reason, and was informed that at a former fair, held in hot July, I had made an exhibition of myself by keeping a penny ice stall, with Bob the errand boy and Frank dressed up as waiters.

She was honest enough to confess that I did the best in the whole fair. "But," she added, with eyes and hands turned up, "to see the crowds of young men, boys, and fast young girls that crowded round, gorging, was shameful." And the memory of it haunted her with shudders.

The tale tickled Aunt Janet's fancy, and, laughing a little, she said to me admiringly, "You droll creature, how dared you do it?"

Lady Janet stayed with us four weeks, then surprised her sister greatly by asking my father to allow her to carry me back with her to the great city.

Mrs. Maria looked much annoyed, as she had coveted this distinction for her favorite, Rosie. My father left it for me to decide; and I, fearing to be parted from my beloved scribbling, said curtly, "Take Rosie; she will do you greater credit, aunt. Though I am grateful to you, I do not care to go."

"It is because you do not care to go that I intend to take you," said Aunt Janet; "I will put up with no denial."

And so, after awhile, the old lady carried her point, and I went up into my shabby little bedroom to pack together my many inky manuscripts, for novel-writing was my hobby and one ambition. Already a few of my stories appeared in a periodical, and I was very n of my little successes. Since Lady Janet's val I had not written much; I was too occu d in reading the many novels the old lady ot me. She was a great reader herself, and horrified Mrs. Maria by reading novels on a Sunday, when all the respectable world was at church.

The old lady would not allow me to take any of my dear, shabby old frocks with me, telling me it would be her pleasure to provide me suitably with everything I could want in London. And I went away, leaving in the hearts of Mrs. Maria and Rose much envy and uncharitableness.

CHAPTER II.—THE TOWN MOUSE.

Metamorphosed from a gawky country girl into an elegantly-millinered London belle, I felt of infinite importance, but sensibly refrained from assuming any airs or graces, confessing myself, after all, but a very plain daw in peacock plumage.

Lady Janet had a handsome house in Mayfair, and was one of the leaders of the fashionable world; and so I, fresh from a country village, found myself expected to ape the manners of the "upper ten." Well, I labored hard, and succeeded to Aunt Janet's satisfaction. I believe the queer old lady had conceived a real fondness for her blunt, unpromising protege; at any rate, we got on famously together, and no word was ever said of my returning to the old way of life.

Discovering my talent for novel-writing, and after a caustic reading of some of my productions, and much cutting and pruning of my tender shoots, the old lady had a book of mine published, and was fully as proud as I was when it turned out a success.

Talking with me about it before it came out, she remarked that, "for a novice, I was very confident." And in answer I told her, "I felt successful." She agreed with me that there was a great deal in that.

I had numerous suitors; in fact, I might even have been termed something of a flirt, since out of them all I could not find my fate.

One night at the theater there came into Lady Janet's box a gentleman, who was presented to me as her nephew, Dr. Malcolm Ponsonby, a distinguished physician, though his age could not have exceeded six-and-thirty. He had a plain, clever face, fine inquiring eyes, and the figure of a Hercules. His manner struck me as being cold, somewhat stern, and just a trifle masterful. On the whole, I liked him, though, because he had sense to pay me the compliment of talking to me like a reasonable fellow-creature.

He had read my book, he said with a winning smile, and thought that between the lines he read the promise of greater things. He did not seem a great favorite with Lady Janet, with whom he argued and contradicted in a manner hardly respectful.

After that night Malcolm came often to visit us, and I met him beside at dinner, ball and kettledrum. There grew between us a great friendship, which, in course of time, ripened into something stronger. Though each secretly felt the other not well chosen, we were both too stubborn and too fond of holding our own. But love leaps all barriers, and it was so in our case; we were betrothed.

When I told Lady Janet of our engagement she seemed sorry, and asked me very solemnly if I really loved her nephew, and whether I expected to be happy.

For answer I told her I loved him dearer than life, and was about to paint a glowing picture of our future, when Polly broke in with, "Silly fools, not fit to live! Twist their necks!"

"Not fit to live together," corrected Lady Janet. And perhaps she was right.

In the spring we were married, and, after a delicious tour through the lake country, we settled down in a quiet old house in Bloomsbury.

Like a foolish woman, I would not acknowledge I had found my master in the cold, self-contained man who called me wife. So even in our early wedded days there were many struggles for supremacy, from which my husband always retired sternly victorious.

Had I but known what pain such success caused him, loving him as truly as I did, I might have desisted; but, ah me! I did not know; I only thought him hard and cold, when truly he was neither.

One of our subjects of dispute was my frequent visits to Lady Janet, who, it must be confessed, led me into much unwholesome gayety. First, he did not like Lady Janet; secondly, he thought the state of my health demanded more care than I chose to give it. Unfortunately he was at that time unavoidably much from home, which I considered a grievance. Then the house was dull, and I dearly loved gayety, and I found it, too, though it was against my husband's counsel. He insisted I took too little rest, and worked my brain too hard by writing.

I would not listen, so arose the rift that was one day to widen into a great breach and part us.

At last my splendid health failed, though I would not own it, and with my health my spirits drooped. During the months that followed Malcolm showed great love and care for me. Had he ever lost it, he would have won my heart afresh by his infinite gentleness.

At Christmas my babe was born, but—O God! the misery and disappointment!—born dead. I knew my husband felt the disappointment keenly, though he hid it through love of me; but in my selfish sorrow I only felt my own pain.

I know also that in his heart he blamed me, and that made me the more bitter, for I heard him say to dear old dad, who had come up to see me: "Phyllis has brought this disappointment upon us entirely by her disregard to my wishes and instructions. She would not be persuaded to take proper care. She is so headstrong."

"Ay, ay," answered dad mildly, "we all have our faults, and Phyl, though she is a true good girl, is no more free than the rest of us."

A few days later my husband told me he had invited Rose to come and stay with us for a few months. I was very angry that he had not consulted me, and I told him so in very ill-judged words; and he left me, for the first time since our marriage, without a kiss of peace. I cried out in my pain that he did not love me, and a thousand other foolish things.

I was quite upset at the idea of Rose's visit in my then state of wretchedness and ill health. I felt that her ceaseless babble and ever-present smile would fairly madden me. I desired only to be left alone to come back to my own gay self.

But even while I dreaded she came, sleek and fair as ever, full of pretty babbling talk and silvery laughter—a striking contrast to my sombre self.

The first night she was with us my husband remarked it, saying:

"I would give something, pet, to see you looking bright and happy, like Rose."

I turned my face to the wall and cried; for my husband's approval was still dear to me, though I was too stupidly proud to seek it. So we let the golden chain of life slip link by link between our fingers, never missing their brightness till they were beyond recall.

Now, in my saner moments, I honestly hold her blameless; but at that time I was very bitter against my vain, foolish little sister, and hated her heartily for stepping between my husband and me, which she did only too surely for awhile.

Always gay and bright, full of pretty home-loving ways, and looking up to Malcolm as a hero, Rose slowly ousted me out of my husband's confidence and companionship. It was to her he turned with tales of his daily life; it was her sympathy he sought when he came home weary; it was Rose, not I, was asked to sing to him at night, to seal his letters, to fetch his hat, or do him any little loving service. To me he was always courteous. True, sometimes, but not often, we quarreled; not hearty, air-clearing storms, with a burst of sunshine at their close in the shape of a loving reconciliation, but chilly, depressing disagreements that left a lingering shadow.

And I—where was my old courageous spirit? I took it all quietly, standing apart from the home circle, wrapped in a proud, jealous discontent.

So a year passed, and found us the same; Rose still blooming fresh and lovely in our midst. Slowly but surely the storm gathered strength, and burst over us, threatening to destroy us.

One day we were invited to a garden party. I really longed for a day of enjoyment alone with my husband, and refused to go unless he took me alone. Disgusted with what he deemed my selfishness, my husband would not go unless Rose accompanied us.

Then I grew furious against my sister, who was fortunately absent, and accused my husband of caring more for her than his wife.

I shall never forget the look of surprise and pain on his face, or his swift condemning words, which, instead of cooling me, maddened me. I raved against the woman I believed had stolen his love. He persisted she was innocent as himself of evil, and wound up by commending her goodness, and expressing a wish that I was more like her.

"Why did you not, then, marry her," I asked, "instead of me? It would have been better for us all."

"Perhaps it would," he answered; "but you forget I was presented to her for the first time at our wedding."

Then he left me, as he said, to recover my senses, and sent Rose up an hour later to ask if I was ready to accompany them. I would not let my sister in, and said I was ill, and they were to go without me.

I did not believe my husband would leave me in anger, but he did; and I saw him drive off with Rose without so much as a glance at my window. Then a great despair fell upon me. Unable to reason, I yielded to the intense desire to end this life of misery, and, ill in mind and body, I resolved to fly that very day from my unhappy home.

Packing up a few things, I called a cab and started at once for Mayfair, leaving a bitter, upbraiding farewell letter for my husband.

CHAPTER III—FRANK'S ADVICE.

I found Lady Janet preparing to start for Scotland on the morrow. I fell upon her neck and sobbed out all my miserable story, begging her to shelter me, and take me away from the scene of my unhappiness.

She was very much shocked and strongly advised me to return to my home; but, seeing that I was really ill in mind and body, she gave way at last, on condition that I sanctioned her writing to my husband, stating that my absence should only be a holiday, spent with her among the Highlands to recover health. The next morning, in answer to Lady Janet's letter, came a command, sternly worded, from my husband, to return home at once.

Had the summons been more gently given I might have pocketed my pride and gone, for I was very wretched and longed to be forgiven; but the cold, hard tone repelled me, and I felt I would rather die than yield. So I started that day with Lady Janet for Scotland, feeling very like a child who expected and deserved a whipping.

When I reached Scotland I received another stern, commanding letter from Malcolm, after which I returned all letters coming in his handwriting unopened.

Freed from the pressure of my miserable, dull, aching jealousy, I soon recovered health and bloom, and really almost enjoyed my visit, which was prolonged into months.

Lady Janet kindly invited Frank to spend the summer vacation with us, and in rowing, fishing and riding with the dear boy I rapidly regained my youth.

Seeing that Frank wanted what he tersely termed a new rig-out, I undertook to proceed to London with him and procure one, so that he might return to school happy. On the morning of our departure there came a letter to Lady Janet, which she pressed into my hand, bidding me read it on the train.

I did so. It was from my husband's brother, Richard Ponsonby, who informed Lady Janet that my husband had been brought to death's door by fever, and had decided, now that he was recovered, to give up his splendid practice in London, and, after a voyage with his brother, intended to settle in New York, where he hoped, when away from all that reminded him of her, to forget the wife who had cruelly deserted him.

Richard spoke bitterly of me, saying he should have visited his aunt, but he could not sit at the same table where I was a welcome guest. He wound up with a request that, if his aunt knew of a respectable woman who would undertake the duties of stewardess, she would recommend her to him, as the woman who had held that situation in his ship had resigned through ill health. They sailed, he stated, on the 20th. It was then the 12th.

Then there was a postscript telling of his own engagement to Rose, whom he extolled as the dearest little girl in the world. This letter almost broke my heart. Yearning for sympathy, I gave it to Frank, crying:

"What shall I do?"

After reading it he electrified me by saying: "Rig yourself out as an old party and go as stewardess yourself. Lady Janet will give you a character."

Oh, how I hugged that boy! How eagerly I caught at the idea! It was so romantic and altogether in accordance with my wishes. Assisted by Frank's ready wit, I rapidly arranged the details.

Arriving in London, I wrote at once to Lady Janet, giving her a full description of my plan, begging her aid and binding her to secrecy. I asked her to send the recommendation at once, and to state that I was a worthy, needy creature, fully to be trusted. But of course I had no notion of the duties I was about to undertake.

Her reply came quickly, scolding me soundly. She said she enclosed the desired letter, but hoped, instead of using it, I would return it to her.

CHAPTER IV.—CARRIED OUT.

In high spirits I set about providing my disguise, which was to consist of a high collar, some smart caps, a light wig, and a pair of blue spectacles, common stuff gowns, and a large snuff-box. I trusted to my really good imitation of a Scotch accent to disguise my voice, and intended to assume a slight deafness and weak eyes.

Frank's delight and amusement when I treated him to a rehearsal of the performance was something to remember.

In all the glory of my disguise, feeling wretchedly nervous, I waited on Capt. Richard Ponsonby, presenting timidly Lady Janet's letter. While he read it I scanned him attentively; he was a fine, handsome fellow, with a happy look in his blue eyes.

"Well, old girl," he said, when he had finished, "according to this you are the very figure for us."

Then he went on to state my duties. Agreeing on all points, we settled my engagement, and he told me to be ready to sail on the 20th.

Just as I was leaving the office, who should come in but Malcolm. I felt ready to faint; but recovering myself, I passed out without my agitation being noticed.

How slowly the hours moved until it was time to sail, and how often my heart failed me I need not say. Enough that I joined the King Cole on the 20th. When passing me in the evening on deck, Richard called my husband's attention to me by remarking merrily:

"None too handsome about the figure-head, eh? Not likely to give any of the boys a heart-ache, is she?"

My husband gazed after the spare figure with its ill-fitting drab gown without interest.

Among the passengers was a dashing New York belle named Florence Greely, who insisted on my husband making love to her by a thousand coquetries, torturing me with her glances. But Malcolm, as his brother said, "like an insensate brute," would not repay her witcheries with the homage they doubtless deserved. We had a fair voyage, passed without anything worthy of notice. The night before we landed Richard rendered me a great service by saying to my husband, "Look here, old boy, if you anchor at New York, and set up a crib of your own, you will want a woman of some sort to look after your house. I wish you'd take that timid, nervous soul, the stewardess; she's lost aboard ship."

I could have hugged Dick when Malcolm, in his listless way, that was now habitual to him, agreed to accept my services. It was the very thing above all others that I so much desired.

A month later I was installed in a handsome house, having under me two maidservants. My husband had never exchanged a dozen words with me, or glanced my way as many times. Dick had arranged everything. And now I passed three months in watching my husband working himself to death in his new practice.

I despaired of ever having sufficient courage to make myself known to him, and late one night I sat down to write to Lady Janet, asking her advice. After writing my letter I tried to read in my garret under the roof. Then hearing my husband retire to his chamber, I put out my candle and went to bed, where I fell quickly asleep, worn out with thinking and sorrow. I don't know how long I slept, but I was awakened by a stifling sensation of heat, and heard fearful cries of "Fire!" and I, away from every one else, was up in a small room, close up under the roof.

I dashed open the window, but there was no way of escape from there. I flew to the door, but only to behold there a sea of fire, with flames leaping forward, as it seemed, to caress me. I shouted madly for help, but heard no reply, save the hoarse shouts of the mob and the thump-thump of the engines. Then, remembering a ladder that led out on to the roof, I crept toward it, and had only gained the summit when the floor fell in with a fearful crash.

Springing to the parapet, I waved frantically the blanket I had wrapped around me, and screamed loudly for help. A shout from below told me my signal was seen; then upon the staring crowd there fell a fearful hush, for at each moment the house was expected to fall, and it seemed madness to attempt my rescue. I realized this as I saw a fireman, who had gallantly offered to be the forlorn hope, fall back from the fire escape fainting from the heat.

Then from out the seething mass of human beings there sprang a man who fought his way from the hands who held him back, and, amid a universal shout of admiration, swiftly mounted the ladder; but not more swiftly than the flames that leaped about him, scorching his very eyes.

Nearer and nearer he came, and I could see his prayerful, though blackened face. O, God! it was my husband. Another moment and he stood by me, shouting wildly, "This way, if you value life! Quickly!"

I followed him, climbing like a cat to the extreme end of the parapet. Then I saw why he had hurried me from the spot where he had mounted, for burning walls were falling in, bearing the escape with them.

A groan of horror, like a dirge, burst from the multitude below. But all was not lost yet, for about his waist and arm was coiled a rope, which, after covering me with a blanket, he tied securely beneath my arms. Then I lost all presence of mind, and implored: "Not yet! O Malcolm! my love, my husband, save yourself!"

At the sound of my voice he reeled, and but for me would have fallen. Then without a word, for I had turned faint, I felt myself swinging in mid-air, steadily guided by a firm, strong hand. In a few seconds I lay a helpless heap among the shouting crowd.

And slowly down from that fearful height there slid a swaying form, which, when it was caught, bruised and bleeding, by friendly outstretched hands, was welcomed with such a shout as rent the thick air, and which even now often finds an echo in my dreams. Then, like the castles built only to see them fall, down came the burning house, a ruin.

A few days later I sat by my darling's bedside, praying that his dear eyes might open with the light of reason. On the white coverlet lay his splintered arm; the side of his face which lay toward me was branded by the flames. But to my anxious eye the face was far handsomer than when it won my girlish fancy, for now I fully understood its strength and great nobility.

Presently the steadfast eyes I used to fear unclosed, and the dear voice called my name; and I fell on the true heart and sobbed out my joy, for, O! his tones were those of love and pardon.

Aunt Janet vowed she never would forgive two such idiotic young people; but a year later, when our boy was born, she sent to say he should be her heir provided Dick and his wife stood sponsors, and his name should be, after her dead husband, Guy Malcolm Ponsonby.

HER NEW SUIT.

With conscious trepidation
My lady stands, a claimant
To gain our approbation
Of her very latest raiment.
When asked why other dresses
By contrast all grow paler,
The secret she confesses—
"This was fashioned by a tailor.

It will serve all times and places,
For shopping or excursions,
For coaching clubs and races,
And summer sea diversions.
One may scale a lofty mountain,
Or cross the English channel,
And sip at Fashion's fountain
In this model suit of flannel.

WHAT WOMEN WANT TO KNOW.

Decorative Screens.

The simplest of screens for home construction can be made from a clotheshorse, plain and strong in structure, and well adapted for the purpose. Two horses five feet high are fastened together so as to swing free, thus making four panels. Use common cotton cloth the width of each fold, to be within one-fourth of each edge, tack securely at the bottom, and carry over the top and down the other side to the bottom; it should be tightly stretched over the frame and securely fastened at the bottom and along the sides with small upholsterers' tacks. The whole is then filled with a thin coat of glue size, which causes the cloth to shrink, binding the frame firmly together, and allowing a more solid surface to work upon. All the exposed surface of the wood on the edges, and the feet, which are cut a little concave on the inside, should be covered with a good coat of black shellac, and rubbed down with emery cloth to a soft, even surface. Next in order is the decoration, which consists of paper. At the top use a pretty strip of single band frieze paper, eighteen inches wide, a background of gold, against which grows very nicely grouped sunflowers, with leaves, stems and buds comprising a low-toned mixture of olives, old gold, browns, and rich, warm red. Below this a narrow strip border of peacock blue, edged with black, separating the frieze from the body, which should be a rich sage green felting paper. To put the paper on, first make a strong flour paste, lay the paper, face down, on a flat, clean board, and cover all the parts equally with a good coat of paste, avoiding all lumps. Give the surface of your screen that is to be immediately covered a thin, even coat of the same laid on with a broad, flat brush. Take the paper up carefully by the top, putting the corners and top exactly in place and draw the hands downward, smoothing the paper well into place as you progress; the paper must of course be cut the exact size required. Paper hangers use a little ivory roller to smooth the edges down firmly in place, as they are oftentimes apt to curl a little when wet, but instead of this a paper knife may be used, rubbing firmly and carefully with the flat side. This felting paper should cover the balance of the screen. At the bottom another strip of blue and black must be added to finish off neatly. At the top, where the cotton is left exposed, a strip of plush three inches wide, a deep, rich red, the full width of the frame, should be tacked on the front and back with brass-headed upholsterers' nails. The back of the screen may be covered with a neat and harmonious paper, put on as described above. The screen, being of home make, is inexpensive, comprising, as it does, only the cost of materials used. A very useful little fire screen may be made with a small, single clotheshorse used for drying small articles, in the same manner, or by covering both sides with oilcloth of a quiet, low-toned pattern (fastened with brass-headed nails); on this could be painted in oils a spray of flowers and a few birds, in imitation of the Chinese. The decoration of these clotheshorse screens may be as varied as different tastes will dictate. For bedroom use, the pretty Watteau designs of cretonne may be advantageously used for the body, and other and harmonious patterns of the same material can easily be selected for the upper and lower borders. For dining rooms, where limited space frequently places one of the family uncomfortably close to the fire-place heater, the center panels of one side of such a screen can be covered with a piece of zinc, firmly nailed on. Such a screen was used in a dining room so narrow that it was necessary to place the screen so close to the fire that the heat actually warped the zinc and made a hole in it. Without such a screen, that side of the table could not have been used. It is hardly necessary to say that such comparatively inexpensive screens can be made as pleasing and harmonious in color and appearance as more expensive ones. The one used in the dining room mentioned above was always admired by those who saw it, although its total cost was only about $9. For those who desire a home-made screen of somewhat better material than paper or cretonne, there is abundant scope for fancy and good taste in the variety of sateens, velours, raw silks and plushes that is now offered. Applique ornaments can be bought at such prices as will permit of the decoration of panels of sateens and plush in a very acceptable manner, and some of the patterns of jute velours make elegant upper or lower panels. A very unique screen may be made as follows: A round upright of white wood an inch thick, and three feet six inches in length, is set into a three-sided piece at the bottom, and a simple flat leg is screwed into each of three faces; at the top fasten a round disk one and a half inches thick; into the edge of this bore a dozen holes; into these fit the pretty but common Japanese fan, costing about 5 cents each. Do not make the holes so tight that the fans cannot be removed if desired. Finish the woodwork with black shellac, well rubbed down, and you will have a pleasing and handy little affair, beside being a neat and desirable way of disposing of these useful little articles, which oftentimes have no resting place, and are generally conspicuous by their absence when wanted.

Conversation at Dinner Parties.

Nothing is commoner than to hear people complain of the dullness of dinner parties. But a guest must be peculiarly unfortunate if he find dullness to right of him, dullness to left of him. If people cannot talk at dinner, when, in the name of human nature and common sense, will their tongues be loosened? At a large dinner party any chatter is welcome and appropriate, provided it be uttered with a gay sense of its transitory importance. Manner more than matter lends interest to table talk; and to seem to be amused is almost identical without being amusing. Among continental communities it is astonishing what an amount of apparently easy effort men will make to be entertaining on a cup of coffee, and especially agreeable on a water ice. The Englishman requires more priming than that; yet how often he is stoked up with the most costly fuel, in the most lavish quantities, without his getting up steam or even emitting so much fire as is testified to by a little smoke! The only drawback to the satisfaction with which a well-arranged dinner party may legitimately be contemplated, either by those who give or those who attend it, is the indifference with which the feminine half of society regard this particular form of hospitality. Nothing lends more luster to a dinner table—not even the fruit, the flowers, the glass or the silver—than here and there a fair face belonging to a young girl, a bride or a young married woman who retains in her aspect the charm of her later 'teens, with the superadded grace of growing womanhood. Yet, as a rule, this important fraction of society, though they attend dinner parties, will always in their confidential moments allow that they look upon this form of society as the least agreeable of all. The secret of their distaste is what some persons will pronounce a proof of refinement. They do not care for the dinner itself. They have lunched to their complete satisfaction; they have treated 5 o'clock tea as no Barmacide feast, but a real and abiding meal; and they look upon what seems to them the portentous length of a dinner party as time stolen from entertainments that more strictly deserve the name. Moreover, the conversation is too confined to their particular tastes. Unless a woman is in love with a man, or entertains for him a fancy, but little distinguishable from that tender sentiment, she has soon had enough of his conversation. She would far sooner talk to fifty men in succession in the course of two hours than be imprisoned between two of them for the same period of time. To the genuine female temperament it is much more agreeable to have the admiration of a score of men than the devotion or the undivided wisdom of one. Under such circumstances—complete indifference to the dinner itself and comparative indifference to her two neighbors—it is not wonderful that young women should find dinner parties the least enchanting forms of society. As years pass on, as youth retreats and admiration dwindles, then, no doubt, even women find comfort in a good dinner. Like cards, or devotion, a touch of the epicurean sense is one of the mitigations of age. Then women are willing both to eat and to talk. The dinner is always acceptable; but we have heard it said, though we pronounce no opinion on the subject, that men cease to care to talk to women just as these reach a period at which alone they are worth talking to.

A Chapter on Corsets.

Corset making has become almost a science. There are corsets for the fat and corsets for the lean, the weak, the strong, the round-shouldered, those with weak hips, etc., so that any one who gives a little attention to her peculiarities when purchasing may be sure of health, comfort and well-fitting corsets. In this city are many stores where hygienic underwear, and especially corsets, are the only articles sold. A lady can go into one of these stores and state that she wants to buy a pair of corsets, but is difficult to fit, and that most makes are uncomfortable. She is then taken into a private "trying-on" room, is measured about the waist and bust, the length of the waist and the breadth of the hips, and is sure to be well satisfied with her purchase. There are short corsets that many persons prefer, and long ones that please others. Then there is the corset with the shoulder-brace and another with lacing on the hips. The woven corsets are the most comfortable, being exceedingly flexible. Some of them are made with as many as 1,000 bones, but the general number is from 200 to 300. A good pair of corsets are expensive, and they make more difference in the fit of a dress than would be supposed. A very pretty corset of fine white sateen, with a short front steel, and embroidered both top and bottom with a shell embroidery, cost $3; it had 300 bones, and was very flexible. The French manufacturers are the best by far, as French women are more particular about the details of their toilet than women of either England or America. A novel summer corset has every alternate rib of open work, which makes it cool for hot weather. These summer corsets are of French jean or sateen, and range in price from $2.50 up to $5. The "Comfort Waist" is a new idea, and has taken very well. It is for old or very stout ladies who cannot wear a tight garment. It is made of jean, sateen or twilled silk, and is in fine cords, with sleeves, and stays only in the back, the front having two whalebones for stiffness. These sell at from $1.75 to $3, and are very comfortable. The "Comfort" corset has a socket adjustment for the shoulder, and laces on each side. They are quite expensive, costing $4 to $5. The most expensive corsets are those of satin, but very few, even wealthy people, buy them, excepting brides and girls going to elegant parties or balls. Some of the daintiest corsets ever sent to this country were handmade in Paris. They were for the daughter of a California millionaire. They were of palest pink surah silk, and were lined with white satin. Across the top was an embroidered spray of apple-blossoms in floss silk, and about the bottom was a similar embroidery in lilies of the valley. They contained 2,113 bones, and were laced with cords of pink twisted silk, the eyelets being cased in gold rings. Another very elegant pair of corsets made in this city recently were of white Chinese silk with lining of pale blue surah. They were hand-painted around the top with little cherubs, carrying a filmy pink veil, which floated all over the white like a pink cloud. A very prominent painter was the artist, and they were a present to his sister, who was always sighing for something new. The bodice corsets are now very fashionable. They are suitable for very slender people. They are made in pale blue, pink, yellow, crimson and black, in satin, sateen and jean. The finest cost $8 and $10.

The Latest Craze.

Pet lizards are the latest agony among the young ladies of Washington. "I was calling the other evening on a young lady," says the Brooklyn Eagle's correspondent at the national capital, "when I noticed something crawling on her dress. I called her attention to it, and she said: 'Why, that is only my pet lizard.' Of course, I didn't want to appear ignorant and make a bore of myself, so I said: 'Yes, a very pretty bird he is, too. Do you often take him out of his cage?' I knew by the expression on her face that I had made a blunder, but I saw that I was in for it and I got reckless and remarked, if I had that thing crawling over me I should think I had the jim jams, or a torpid liver, or malaria, or something that would require my immediate presence on a fishing trip to Florida. A man don't know much anyhow, and when he meets a fashionable craze he ought to know enough to keep still; but, unfortunately, I have curiosity enough for a woman, and I was bound to find out all about it. Then she told me confidentially that her darling lizard came from Tiffany's, and that it was real nice and very affectionate, etc., etc. And yet this same girl would faint at the sight of a harmless little green snake and go into hysterics if an innocent mouse came within ten feet of her. This may be fashion's edict, but I am willing to wager that no girl who has a Sunday night young man, and who entertains him in the parlor where only one chair is devoted in the whole course of the evening, will be very likely to wear a lizard as an ornament."

Recent Novelties.

There is a pretty fashion, lately come into vogue, of wearing tiny baskets of flowers hanging at the side of the evening dress designed for garden-party or dancing wear; they are baskets cut into halves, and attached to the right-hand side of the skirt, and are in some ways an improvement on the hanging mouchoir muff made of flowers, which were apt to get into the wearer's way. The flower baskets suggest an air of idyllic simplicity when not spoiled by a glance at the owner's face, and are very appropriate for bridesmaids' adornments at church weddings. Flower fans are also a new foible—fans covered either with the exquisite blooms of the hot house, to last but a day, or, better still, a fan of your own manufacture, composed of artificial flowers and buds, costing about half the price of a ready-made one. A fan taken apart recently revealed the modus operandi of its construction. The foundation was of the flimsiest white silk, covered with rows of very fine, delicate ferns, lying one over the other like feathers on a bird's breast; these form the background; the flowers are then mounted in an easy, careless way, to look as natural as possible. Some like the monogram designed in the center, but the monogram mania is now a thing of the past. Two fans made after this pattern were sent as wedding presents to a young bride. One was covered with white azaleas and edged with maiden-hair fern; the other, designed for the bridesmaid, was of white lilacs, with a spray of purple lilac laid across the center of the fan.

How to Keep Cut Flowers.

A Cleveland reporter found his way into a florist's recently and feasted his eyes and nose on the beautiful buds that lay in bouquets there.

"How long will this clove pink last?" he inquired.

"Oh, with care, a week or ten days. A solid rosebud will last about the same time. There's a good deal in knowing how to keep flowers fresh."

"Do you use any preparations? Any salt in the water, or ammonia, or the like?"

"Not at all. That's all nonsense. All that is necessary to keep flowers fresh is to keep them moist and cool. If people, instead of dipping flowers in water or putting them in a vase with water, would simply wrap them up in a wet newspaper, they would find that they would keep far fresher over night. A wet towel or napkin would be too heavy, and would crush the blooms too much, and, besides, it would allow the moisture to evaporate too easily. See that box of buds. They were packed in Boston Monday in wet paper, and you might say they are fresher now than when they came off the bush."

"Why do you send clear to Boston for rosebuds? haven't you got the same kind of roses here?"

"Exactly the same kind, but they won't grow so nicely here. Take this Boston bud, for example, and put it beside a native bud. They are of exactly the same variety, both being Bon Silenes. But the stem of the Boston bud is far longer and stouter than that of the native bud. The colors are far more brilliant, and the bud is more durable. When the stem is long and thick we don't have to use so much wire to strengthen it, and that makes it much more convenient."

"What advantage has Boston over Cleveland in the raising of roses?"

"It's the climate. It is true that it isn't so warm there as it is here, and it hasn't been extremely sultry here this winter. But the temperature in a green-house is easily enough regulated, as well as the quantity of moisture in the air, and the soil is made just so rich with all gardeners. It can't be because they are any more skillful in raising flowers there than we are here, for I know of gardeners who have come here from the East and expected to do the same things they did there, and failed completely. Even in New York the florists sell ten Boston buds to one of their own growth, and it's just so all over the country. You know the more culture there is bestowed upon a rose, the more double it becomes—that is, the more of these stamens turn into petals. Well, I suppose that as Boston is credited with possessing an atmosphere of 'culchah,' that has something to do with it."

Foibles of Fashion.

The ready-made costumes of light summer woolens are very attractive, both in style and price. Among these are stylish and serviceable cashmeres, in fawn color beige, terracotta, ocean blue, reseda, strawberry and olive, showing a gleam of scarlet or gold in the ruche linings and panel facings. The drapings are caught up here and there with flots and flowing ends of ottomon ribbon or plain satin the color of the dress, faced with a color matching that of the ruche lining. Ostrich tips make a becoming trimming to evening dresses, cut square or heart-shape in the neck. This trimming is not necessarily carried out on other portions of the dress, for where a toilet has fan-pleatings or ruchings of the dress material, or is lace-trimmed, the feather garniture may head the lace or pleating set around the neck and sleeves. To complete the effect, however, a cluster of tips, mingled with flowers, may be fastened to the left shoulder and upon the right side of the skirt drapery.

Beautifully fine, all-wool fabrics, in most delicate evening shades of lilac, almond, turquoise-blue, crushed strawberry, pale willow green, sea-shell pink, and primrose, are shown, designed for the "smartest" of ball or reception toilets. French cashmeres in pattern boxes are exquisitely hand painted or embroidered, and require no other trimming. Unmade, these pattern dresses cost $90, and and an imported dress of the same material made up over surah costs $150. But a very much less expensive and equally artistic and beautiful toilet can be produced with the plain fabric in monochrome, simply adorned with ruffles and drapings of cream white lace.

Stylish young ladies now wear the Chevreuse collar with the promenade costume trimmed with deep Venetian cut-work or guipure embroidery. The cuff to match is a plain turnover, and is generally half covered with a long glove. The lace border, which is usually put on over a strip of colored ribbon to form an officer's collar and cuff, dispenses with the ruche or frill of crepe lisse about the neck and wrist. A small fancy jeweled brooch representing an insect or flower fastens the collar.

With the rage there is at present for making the figure as slight as possible, under-garments are made correspondingly narrow. All chemises are pointed. These are called princess chemises, and some of them are so tight fitting that they are cut open in the back like children's aprons, and close by means of buttons and button-holes. Sometimes the waist and drawers are joined, thus making one of the two garments, and obviating the necessity of a band around the waist.

The newest, and of course therefore, the very sweetest, thing in weddings is reported from Louisville, Ky. In June a daughter of Gen. Buckner, who is to marry Mr. Belknap of that city, will have what is called a "rainbow wedding," as the bridesmaids, in couples, will wear the prismatic colors, each pair having a different pale hue of India silk.

Sunshades are larger than ever, and most voluminous with their lace flounces, their gigantic handles and flowing bows of ribbon. The style of handle considered most chic is the Japanese sword; but finely-carved ivory handles are in better taste, if less fanciful.

The pretty zephyrs in "ginghams effets" come in beautiful mixtures of strawberry and olive, pale blue and cream, crossed with hair lines of Venetian red; dark hunter's green and pink, and pale primrose and mauve, crossed with lines of dark, golden brown.

New handkerchiefs are of fine linen batiste, pure white and tinted with jardiniere embroideries of fine artistic designs and work, showing butterflies, bees, flowers and figures in combination on the borders and in the corners.

White straw bonnet and hats are not considered in quite as good style this season as those of dyed straw in colors of gold, terracotta, amber, bronze, strawberry, olive, nuns' gray, laurel green, and brown.

The handsomest white muslin house dresses, elaborately trimmed with fine embroideries and laces, cost as much as $150; from this they can be bought at prices running downward to $15.

Flower dog-collars, and fans to match, will be a pretty feature of summer evening dress.

House Furnishing.

There is a rage just now for the Oriental. Table scarfs are made of heavy yellow fabrics, trimmed with Eastern embroideries, cut out of chair-backs made in Cairo. There is a mania for Egyptian ribbons in brilliant colorings and unique designs, and incredible prices are given for "real" Oriental laces ten inches deep, which is really fine imitation lace artistically dyed in many different colors nicely blended. Ultra-fashionable women have gone so far as to make up garden-party dresses out of Syrian curtains; but these dresses, to do them justice, look better than they read, if arranged by an artistic hand that adds a leavening of yellow Indian silk by way of finish.

Stylish halls are furnished with a settee of wood, a mirror with pegs in the frame, a table of carved wood, and high chairs with box seats. The floor and wainscoting are of hard wood, with a preference for oak, and a wooden ceiling with cross beams is added. The handsomest halls have Oriental rugs on inlaid wood floors, mosaic floors for the vestibule, marble wainscoting, jeweled doors, or a stained-glass transom, a marble vase on the newel post, from which gas lights spring out, and stairs of easy tread—only six and three-fourths inches for each step—that are too handsome to be carpeted.

The English styles now most commended by dealers in household furniture are those of the latter half of the eighteenth century—the styles of a hundred years ago—in preference to earlier English styles that have become so commonly known under the names of Elizabethan and Queen Anne. In third-rate shops every bit of furniture with spindles or a balustrade is dubbed Queen Anne, and every straight-backed chair is Elizabethan, but this craze for such things has been overdone, and at first-class houses the jargon is entirely dropped.

A lamp shade of pale blue may have the proper æsthetic touch given to it by running a fine wire through lace and then bending it around the bottom of the shade so that it forms a little flounce. The lace should be about three inches deep, and should be scant. There should be just fullness enough to make it hang gracefully.

Square tables are used for dinner and breakfast rooms. The favorite wood for these is oak, but there are also many dining rooms fitted up with mahogany and cherry. The buffet or sideboard is in English designs with beveled glass or brass decorations, or else it is richly carved in the Flemish fashion.

Plain sideboards have shelves without glass doors for china, and may have a colored marble or plain wood top, either of which must be covered with a linen cloth embroidered in colors or ornamented with drawn work, and fringed on the ends.

Household Hints.

A fancy dish of potatoes for teas is made by pressing mashed potatoes through a colander; let them lie lightly in the dish just as they fall, then set them in the oven to brown. They should be well seasoned with butter, pepper and salt before they are put through the colander. If you like potatoes prepared in this way, it is a time-saving invention to have a colander made for this purpose. Take an ordinary tin pan, and have holes punched in the bottom of the size you require; it will then take but a few minutes to prepare a large dish.

For a nice and economical pudding take thin slices of stale bread, butter them on both sides, cover the bottom of a pudding dish with them, and spread jam of any kind over them; then add another layer, and so on till the dish is full. Have a thin layer of buttered bread on the top. Serve hot with cream or with a custard made of a pint of milk, one cup of sugar, and two eggs; flavor the custard with any extract which will be in harmony with the jam.

A cheap dessert is made by boiling two large spoonfuls of sago in nearly a quart of water; add, when boiling, the peel of one lemon; put in a little muslin bag a little grated nutmeg; before taking from the fire remove the muslin bag; then add three eggs and a little salt; put in a pudding dish and let it bake for half an hour; serve with sauce or with sugar and cream.

There is no plant more pleasing to the eye in the garden than a bell pepper plant, and two or three of these will yield enough of the green peppers to make a nice little jar of pickles. The filling, if made exactly as you make chopped pickles, is excellent. A few seeds dropped in the hot bed, or a few plants purchased, will well repay for the trouble.

The paper bags which are sometimes sent out from the tea store with a pound of tea in furnish good designs for the ornamenter of a crazy quilt. The pictures are exactly adapted for this work, and are so varied in size and subject as to give a good opportunity for choice. The outlines alone may be worked or the whole figure appliqued.

An easy way to make pretty white dresses for small children is to make the upper part of white goods which is woven in such a way that it has the appearance of insertion and of puffs; the bottom may be a ruffle of Hamburg. These dresses are so easily ironed and it takes so little time to make them that they are highly recommended.

Graham biscuits are very nice if eaten while fresh and warm. To one pint of milk allow half a cup of melted butter, half a cup of sugar, and two eggs; add enough flour to make a stiff batter; do not attempt to knead them, but drop from a spoon into hot muffin-tins.

Iron rust may be removed from delicate garments, upon which you dare not try oxalic acid, by mixing the juice of a lemon with some salt; put this over the rusted spots, and then hold over the spout of a steaming tea-kettle. This is almost always effectual.

A large and good "batch" of cookies can be made from this recipe: One cup of butter, two cups of sugar, four eggs, two tablespoonfuls of sour or buttermilk, half a teaspoonful of soda with flour enough to make a moderately stiff dough.

TABLE SUPPLIES.

Vegetables More Plenty—Prices a Shade Lower—Strawberries Coming in and Cheaper—Fish Abundant—More Chickens on Sale—Meat Cuts Firm—Spring Lamb—Butter Unchanged—Eggs Higher.

There would have been a large trade yesterday on the market house grounds if there had been no rains. Enough people were out to give a good indication thereof. During the week country wagons increased in numbers, but yesterday were scarce, and some of the street stands were empty. The inside stalls, though, were well supplied, were but poorly patronized, provoking sundry d—n's from the proprietors versus the outside stands, that were alleged to be getting all the business. The sheds are to be torn down this week, and wagon trade is to be done on the other side of the street, where the sidewalk is too narrow to accommodate the usual summer crowds. The old stands will have to "go," then the interior men can have the field to themselves. Whether this will result in monopoly remains to be seen. The talk among the gardeners and wagon men yesterday was, that they would take their wares to other places and avoid St. Paul.

THE BILL OF FARE.

All classes of fresh vegetables were in greater supply, if not fully abundant. Lettuce was plenty, including some of very large-sized heads. Spinach was lower in price. Dandelion scarce. Young onions were cheaper. Green peas and string beans showed better supply. Cucumbers were seen at more stands; some on sale were home grown and went off on sight. Cauliflower was very scarce. In fruit, oranges of large size were sold at advanced prices. Apples scarce and slow. Lemons unchanged. Bananas and pineapples plenty, but selling at former prices. Strawberries were in good supply, retailing at 15@20c per measure called a quart. A few cherries are on sale, but poor in quality. The receipts of fish were large on yesterday, approaching to overstock. Whitefish and trout are now lower. Some bluefish from the Eastern seaboard came in. Shad in fair supply. General fish demand moderate for the week. Meat cuts are selling at firm prices, especially choice beef and spring lamb. Pork and mutton go off slowly. Chickens are in better supply, but not enough to go around. Some went as high as 25c for dressed. Turkeys are scarce and not much called for. Yesterday the range for chickens was 20@22c. Live chickens very scarce. Butter prices are unchanged. Eggs are higher, selling at 16@17c per doz, and farmers' eggs at 20c.

EVENING SONG.

Behind the hill top drops the sun,
The curled heat falters on the sand;
While evening's ushers, one by one,
Lead in the guests of twilight land.

The bird is silent overhead,
Below the beast has lain him down;
Alone the marbles watch the dead,
Alone the steeple guards the town.

The south wind feels its amorous course
To cloistered sweets in thickets found;
The leaves obey its tender force,
And stir 'twixt silence and a sound.

Statistics show that not quite one-third of our population is foreign born or foreign in the second degree. Of the fifteen millions included in the above computation, about four millions and a half have Irish fathers. The number having German fathers is three hundred and fifty thousand larger, showing that the Germans outnumber the Irish in the Union. The Irish are less than a third of the foreign population.

Six officers of the Army and navy have been involved in disreputable practices that have recently been made public. Lieutenant Colonel Morrow, Paymaster Wasson, Paymaster Smith, and Colonel Ilges are accused of dishonesty, while Colonel Nickerson and Commander White are in disgrace on account of domestic scandals. Those in power, both in the War and Navy department, are seriously concerned about the state of things that these exposures indicate. These things are attributed in a great measure, to the cankering of sloth, a long peace and the evil example of lavish expenditure in civil life, at Washington and elsewhere. No one who knows the service well can credit the idea of general demoralization, for our army officers as a rule, are, among the best types of American citizenship, but these cases are the result of the evil tendencies referred to.

An eastern electrician of note has applied for a patent for what he terms an improved device for executing criminals condemned to death. His device is a method of causing instantaneous death, by electricity without pain to the criminal and without disfiguring his body. The full charge of electricity enters the criminal's body at the spinal cord and passes out at his feet, the criminal seeing nothing of the machinery but an ordinary chair in which he is placed. He accompanied his application by an assignment transferring to the government the right to use it. He also intends to give it to all foreign governments that may desire it. The patent office returned the patent to him, saying it had no power to receive it, and telling him to seek out the proper authority. The inventor said he invented this machine in the interest of humanity. He says that there is no possibility of its failing to do its work quickly and well. He will manufacture one of his arm chairs and get it in working order He intends to have a bill introduced in the next legislature of New York authorizing its use.

It is a theory of scientists, by no means fully explained, that spots on the sun, which have been numerous for a few years past, may possibly be the cause of tornadoes, or, more probably there may be some condition or agency yet unknown which is the common cause of both. For some time past the sun-spots have been increasing in number, but it is believed that their maximum has been reached. For a year or more storms have been exceptionally violent and destructive on sea and land. If there is anything in the sun-spot theory, and if it is true that the period of greatest spottedness has just been passed, it may be expected that the worst of the tornado season is over also. Though tornadoes are more frequent and destructive this year than usual, perhaps than ever before, every year brings some of them, and the month of May is the height of the season for them. A few occur usually in March; April is not a tornado month; in May and the first half of June they are abundant, less frequent in July and August, and in September again their number increases. During the rest of the year they are rare, but have been known to occur even in the winter in the gulf states.

The kindergarten connected with the public schools of St. Louis had become highly popular when it was suddenly declared illegal, because the constitution of the state provides that all persons between the ages of 6 and 20 years shall be gratuitously instructed in the public schools, and that the school fund shall be faithfully appropriated to "no other uses or purposes whatever." The expenditure for the instruction of children under the age of 6 years is not authorized, and as the kindergarten, is devoted to the education of young children, it falls under the constitutional prohibition. This case is deemed by many persons one of peculiar hardship because the kindergarten at St. Louis is considered a useful adjunct. But admitting this, the expenditure of school money cannot be too carefully restricted or too strictly limited to legitimate purposes. There is a strong tendency in many places to attach expensive things that are not of general utility, to common school instruction, and adequate funds for legitimate purposes are often diverted to mere accomplishments, more ornamental than useful to the great mass of scholars.

The Sunday sermons of the celebrated London preacher, the Rev. Mr. Spurgeon, are telegraphed to two or three American papers and appear in their issues of Monday. They clubbed together on the expenses and crow lustily over what is termed "unparalleled enterprise." If the matter was worth the money it would be so regarded by the reader, but it is not, and after the novelty of reading on Monday morning a London sermon of Sunday has worn off, people will have no more desire to read the sermons of Spurgeon than those of Beecher or any other noted preacher. The telegraph is not a new invention, wonderful although it may be, and matter other than important news, is not made especially interesting or valuable because it is telegraphed. But it is a peculiarity of some juvenile journalists to attach great importance to all sorts of stuff that is placed on the wires for transmission, and imagine that the public believe some subtle agency transmutes the veriest trash on the wires into something worthy the pens of "men and angels." But the average reader knows better.

The boy was engaged in carrying hay into the tent where the elephants are quartered, and suddenly found himself entwined in the trunk of the ferocious brute. The elephant, after swinging the lad in the air, threw him violently to the ground and then proceeded to crush him by walking on him. The boy's screams brought to his assistance a number of men who, with poles, hooks and clubs drove the beast from the victim, who was picked up in an unconscious condition. The boy had one leg badly torn and lacerated, and arm broken, and also suffered a contusion of the pelvis. His injuries are such as to maim him for life, even should they not prove fatal. There was no provocation for the assault, the elephant simply being seized with one of the fits of rage to which he has been subject.

D. C. Winchell, of Marshaltown, Iowa, in charge of a lot of cattle for Messrs. Waller & Carr, of Jamestown, Dak., was killed at the Union Stock yards St. Paul on Wednesday last. In switching, one of the engines on the different tracks got out of order and became beyond control, and backing down ran into the caboose. Had Winchell remained inside he would have escaped, but hearing the noise he stepped out on the rear of the car and was crushed in the concussion.

John Fitzgerald, John Walton and John Nausland, log drivers employed by the Muskegon boom company, were drowned on the Muskegon river at Hersev, Mich.

Horrible Hazing.

Syracuse, N. Y., Special telegram, June 2. —A terrible outrage is reported to have been committed on two sophomores of the Madison university and Baptist Theological seminary, at Hamilton, by their fellow students. The details, if true, show that it is one of the most diabolical instances of hazing that ever disgraced a college. After the two selected victims had retired last night their doors were broken in, and they were compelled to dress, bound and gagged, thrust into a carriage and driven to Earlville, where a hall had been engaged. Two large barrels had previously been procured for the occasion. Sharpened nails had been driven into them from the outside so that they protruded nearly an inch on the interior. The two victims were placed in these barrels after the gags had been removed. The barrels were then headed up. The floor of the hall was wet down, and a small fire built in the centre. The barrels were then rolled from one end of the hall to the other, and several times around and over the fire. Revolvers were fired and firecrackers exploded. The cries of the imprisoned young men could be heard above all the confusion. A constable demanded admission, but was driven away. The barrels were finally rolled down stairs and into the street. The heads were knocked in and the two students liberated. They were now more dead than alive and presented a pitiable sight. When the citizens offered to call a physician the firing of revolvers began, and all were glad to retire. The young men's clothing was nearly torn from their bodies and the blood flowed from their wounds. The hazers were indignant over the inteference of the villagers, broke every street lamp in the town and destroyed other valuable property. The hazers left town at 3 a. m., taking the young men with them. The whole affair has caused great excitement and indignation.

The Fourth Hanging in Dublin.

Thomas Caffrey, the fourth of the Phœnix park murderers, was hanged at Kilmainham jail Dublin, Ireland, at 8 o'clock Saturday morning. During his farewell interview with his mother Friday Caffrey broke down completely. The crowd outside the prison numbered only about fifty persons. Among these were the mother and brother of the prisoner and a woman who has been present at all the executions of men convicted of the murder of Cavendish and Burke, and prayed for the condemned man. Caffrey wrote a letter to his mother Friday evening, in which he said:

> I hope you will never have cause to blush for my name. As I am paying the penalty of my crime in this world, I hope I won't have to suffer for it in the next.

Cafferey was composed on the scaffold. His death was instantaneous. The man with whom the British government has oponed the second month of the hanging season in Dublin was tried in the early part of May together with Patrick Delaney. They were both convicted and sentenced to be executed yesterday, but Delaney's sentence was committed to imprisonment. Both Gladstone and Lord Lieut. Spencer were strongly importuned to spare Caffrey, but refused. The man hanged yesterday was the fourth to suffer death for killing Cavendish and Burke: Brady, Curley and Fagin having been executed last month. Timothy Kelly will be the fifth to hang, the 9th inst. having been fixed as his day of doom, unless the authorities see fit to interfere. There is a strong belief in Kelley's innocence.

The Methodist Itinerate System.

At a meeting of presiding elders of the northwest at Minneapolis on Wednesday last, the following resolution was introduced:

Resolved, That it is the judgment of this convention that the time has come when the limit of the pastoral term should be removed so that the annual appointments may be made if, in the judgment of the appointing power, the interest of the church demands the continuance of its pastor.

A. J. Mead here jumped excitedly to his feet and said, "Brothers, we are here to work, not to tamper with the economy of the church. I move the motion to be withdrawn."

The chairman—I can't see very well how that can be done. This resolution is before you, gentlemen, and you will have to discuss it. So go ahead.

After a long and earnest discussion the resolution was withdrawn and another meaning exactly the same thing was substituted. At length the question was called for. The ayes and noes were demanded, and the resolution was carried by a vote of 25 to 12.

Conflagration at Lynchburg, Va.

On Wednesday morning 30th, a large amount of property was destroyed by fire, including the Daily Virginian building and fixtures, Commercial bank, the large hardware establishment of Jones, Watts Bros. & Co, the large tobacco manufactory of Flood & Peters, and other business houses. Several residences were also destroyed. The fire was got under control after raging two hours and destroying property to the amount of over $300,000. The loss of Jones, Watts Bros. & Co. is estimated at $130,000; insurance only $32,000. The loss on the Virginian office is $20,000; insurance $15,000. Peters & Flood, tobacconists, lose about $50,000; insured $34,000. A number of smaller buildings were destroyed, on which there is partial insurance, and others partly damaged by water and fire. Five men, Halsey, Gouldman, Policeman James Vaughan, Felix Beldalare, James Clemens and Capt. William Moore, the last a conductor on the Norfolk & Western railroad, were buried under falling walls of the Virginian building and killed.

Settling the Barbed Wire Business.

Another blow against the patent monopoly was struck by the federal court at St. Louis. The Iowa barbed wire cases, involving the validity of the Glidden & Kelly patents, owned by Washburn & Moen, were declared void. This decision is in harmony with the recent decision of the drive well cases in Des Moines, and it works another epoch in the overthrow of two of the most outrageous corporations ever fastened upon the farmers of the west. The last decision is more far-reaching in its results, and is even of more importance than the drive well case. The news will be read by millions of farmers with special pleasure.

American Crank in Birmingham.

The Birmingham, Eng., police arrested Monday an avowed American Fenian, who declares the intention of making trouble at the Bright celebration next week. The man is forty years of age. Since his arrest he has received letters from America and Paris. He gives his name as George Smythe. Previous to his arrest he bought fifty cartridges for a large revolver, and then entered a tavern, where he displayed the revolver and threatened to disturb the Bright procession on Monday. The police were summoned. When they arrived Smythe was trying his revolver in the tavern yard. He was secured after a struggle, during which he tried to shoot an officer.

Lincoln's Confidence in Crook.

Secretary of War Lincoln speaking about Crook's campaign, he said: "I have every confidence in General Crook, and have no fear that he will get in a situation from which he will be unable to extricate himself. With reference to the reports that Gen. Crook has violated any treaty stipulations, I am free to say that there is nothing whatever in the reports. When Gen. Crook telegraphed me last April that he was about to cross the border, I replied that he must exercise extreme caution and preserve intact the provisions of our treaty with Mexico."

Worse Than Journalism.

Chicago Special: O. B. Ireland, the former proprietor of the Times at Blunt, Dak., came to the city, Saturday, with money to invest. He bought for $400, a half interest in a restaurant. The afternoon of the purchase his partner borrowed $75 of him. On Sunday Ireland opened his restaurant only to find it stripped of all portable stock, and a note from his partner saying he was off for Canada, and wishing him much joy with the restaurant. Creditors began to pour in and the place was closed up. Ireland will realize about $75.

Death of a Noted Jesuit.

Rev. Father John De Blieck, one of the oldest and most distinguished members of the Order of Jesus in the country, and for many years a leading educator in Jesuit schools, including those at St. Louis, Cincinnati, Bardstown, Ky., and Chicago, died in Chicago, Monday, of cancer of the throat, aged sixty-two years.

Love's Frightful Fall.

From the Chicago Tribune.

The tender gray twilight of a June evening was settling down upon the earth as Natalie McIntosh sat down on a little rustic bench, whose cozy look made it a fit place indeed for love's tryst and vigil. Presently George W. Simpson entered the gate and was soon by her side. For an instant no word was spoken between them, and as they stood there, her arms about his neck, her head upon his shoulder, Natalie felt that without the love of this man her life would be a starless blank. Hers was a deep, trusting, if-the-rope-breaks-we-are-gone love that made her voice falter and die away when she spoke about it.

"You love me?" she asked, looking up to George with eyes in which there shone the radiance of a tender, beautiful passion; "love be better than all the world besides; better than you have ever loved any one in your whole life?"

George did not answer, for as Natalie spoke there came to him a haunting memory of dark, splendid eyes, a bright face, smiling and radiant and dimpled, and dewy, scarlet lips that had often met his own in sweet, clinging, don't-let-go-if-you-value-your-life kisses. He thought of all this as he bent tenderly over Natalie, her golden hair touching his cheek and the perfume from the lillies she wore mingling with his breath.

The girl noticed his silence. "Why do you not answer me?" she said.

George did not reply, but drawing her still closer to him would have kissed her again.

"I want no kisses," she exclaimed passionately, withdrawing herself from his arms, "from lips that are not sacred to me alone. I have given you all that a woman can give—the love of her whole nature. My heart has been a lute for you to play upon, and yet when I ask you if you love me there comes no answer from your lips and your eyes do not look into mine," and drawing herself up in the imperious whoa-Emma way that befitted her so well she sat down on a rustic bench with a dull sickening thud that told all too plainly of a broken bust'e.

In an instant George was by her side, and Natalie was sobbing as if her heart would break. "Forgive me, darling," he murmured, in low bock-beer tones.

"But I demand an answer," exclaimed the girl passionately, "and again ask if you ever loved another."

"I did," he replies. "Loved her wildly, madly."

"Who was it?" she asks, her cheeks aflame with the hot flush of anger.

Bending low over her, George whispers into her left ear the fatal words: "Lydia Pinkham!" and with a hollow, mocking laugh flees into the darkness.

History repeats itself. A young man at Abbeville, Ala., last year worked for a man with the understanding that at the end of the year he was to have as as compensation for his services the man's daughter for a wife and a double-barreled shot gun. At the end of the year the gun was delivered to him, and he married the girl.

The Washington County Agricultural society are taking steps to have a fair in the fall that shall in all respects be a credit to the county and to Stillwater.

Minnesota School Teachers in South America.

Winona, Special, June 1.—Some three or four weeks ago authority was received in Winona from the governor of the Argentine Republic to secure and forward, at the earliest practicable date, eight accomplished female teachers for important positions in the Normal schools of that country. While the negotiations were pending it was deemed best, for obvious reasons, to make no public mention of the fact. Now, however, the arrangements have been consummated. The entire quota called for has been secured, and your correspondent is enabled to give a full statement of the case. The authority conferred came directly from the minister of public instruction, Mr. Roca, through the inspector general of national colleges and normal schools. Sr. Jose M. Torres, and was addressed to Mrs. S. W. Morgan nee Miss Franc E. Allyn, who for four years served with distinction in the national normal school at Parana, Senor Torres in a letter to Prof. Phelps, referring to has distinguished services in the cause of education, speaks in the highest terms of the work done by his former pupils in the profession of teaching in the Argentine Republic. In writing to Mrs. Morgan, Senor Torres asks her to solicit the help of Prof. Phelps in selecting the most able and expert teachers that are willing to come. It may be well to recur to the fact that Miss S. E. Wade was the first representative of the normal school at Winona accepting a call to the Argentine Republic, leaving for that country in 1875. She was followed by Miss Clara Armstrong in the same year; by Miss Francis Armstrong in 1876; Miss Francis Allyn in 1878, and Misses Mary O. Graham, Kate Grant and Clara Allyn in 1879. The services of these worthy ladies has been so satisfactory as to cause a demand for a further reinforcement of eight, all of whom are graduates in the earlier classes, or have been teachers in the normal school. They are well known as highly accomplished and successful teachers, and they will bear with them the best wishes of hosts of friends in this city and and state. The roster is as follows:

Miss Alcinda Morrow, Miss Sarah H. Strong, Miss Myra Kimball, Miss Sarah E. Eccleston, Miss Antonette Choate, Miss Mary Couse, Miss Bernice [illegible]

They expect to sail about the first of July.

The Breckenridge Banker.

Luce, defaulting bank cashier of Perham and Breckenridge, had put all his property, except his mill near Perham, in his wife's name? The bondsmen, eight in number, will probably have to suffer, papers having been served upon them. The county of Wilkin had deposited $10,000 in the bank the bondsmen having gone on Luce & Stuar's bond as a county depository. The partnership between the two had virtually dissolved, but the notice of dissolution never having been published, the firm is legally in existence, and the bondsmen held. Depositors at Perham, it is said, will suffer more than at Breckenridge, although the Perham bank held no public money. An association of citizens at Perham had been making overtures to Luce for some time to buy him out and start a bank on the German-American plan, but he wanted $10,000 for the business alone, which they were unwilling to pay.

The bodies of John Motter and wife were recovered on Thursday, twelve days after they were drowned, at Lake City, by parties who had been on the watch. The coldness of the water, probably, preventing their rising earlier.

Jackson Republic: A rumor which we would gladly believe ill-founded reaches Jackson that Jesse Doughty, the well-known Spirit Lake produce dealer, has skipped the country with a woman not his wife.

At Minneapolis, the jury in the case of the state against William D. Thompson who was on trial charged with embezzling $18,000 from Farnham & Lovejoy, while in their employ as head bookkeeper returned a verdict of not guilty, after a deliberation of ten minutes, there being but one ballot taken which resulted as stated. This is the third trial, the jury in both the preceding cases being unable to agree. In the first trial they were evenly divided, and the second stood four for conviction and eight for acquittal.

An elevator at Donnelly, owned by D. R. Sutherland & Co. of Morris was burned recently. The elevator was purchased three years ago at a cost of $4,500, and $3,000 worth of improvements have since been made, making present worth $7,500. The building was insured to the amount of $5,000.

Father Berghold, the Catholic priest of New Ulm, has purchased the Baumgartner property from Jacob Pfenninger, and will turn the same into a hospital. This enterprise is much applauded by the New Ulmers, as it will supply a long felt want in that city.

J. Kenny of Whitewater, Wis., arrived at the Dunn house, Montevideo, on a collecting tour last week. Tuesday night he left the hotel and has not been seen since. It is believed that he wandered off in a fit of mental aberration and jumped into the river. He had about $500 on his person.

McDole, Company G, Ninth Minnesota volunteers, war of 1861." Mr. Smith writes that he is only anxious that the proper parties receive the property, provided they want it, and they can obtain the same by writing to him at the above address. By references to the adjutant general's report of 1866, it is found that William McDole was a member of Company G, Ninth Minnesota, that his residence at the time of his enrollment was St. Cloud, Stearns county, and that he was discharged, per order, May 31, 1865.

Prof. Rathvon's Theories About Eels.

From the West Chester (Penn.) Record.

Only recently Prof. Rathvon, of Lancaster, solemnly announced that all eels went out to sea to spawn, and said he had them migrating in hundreds. This struck the average person as a wonderful statement, especially when they thought of these swarms of eels climbing up the face of dam breasts 12 to 20 feet high on small streams in which little or no water ran over the breast. It was an opinion on a par with the professor's learned views on the pollen of the milk weed, some specimens of which were sent him from the Village Record office a few years ago clinging to a beef's leg. The professor promptly pronounced these pollen vessels some kind of an insect. Careful observers have found out that eels raise their young much as other fish, generally laying their eggs on an old bit of timber, and our fish reporter, who found some of these on a stick of rotten wood, hatched them out by keeping them in moderately warm water for several days, and fed the little ones on melted tallow or oil until they were big enough to take care of themselves. This spring John F. Ingram, one of the West Chester's famous fisherman caught an eel in which there was a well-developed roe, the fish being apparently nearly ready to spawn. He said that it was the first time in his experience that he had ever seen such a thing, and there are many fishermen who never have.

Youngest Man in Congress.

There is said to be an unusually large number of young men among the members elect to the 48th Congress, but the youngest man who has ever been elected to Congress since the adoption of the Federal Constitution was John Randolph of Virginia. The New York Columbian of February, 1810, has the following: "His fellow-citizens considering him a prodigy, elected him their representative to Congress at the juvenile age of 22 years. We shall never forget the day when the beardless legislator presented himself before Mr. Sedgwick the Speaker, to take the customary oath. Struck with his boyish appearance demanded, with that sternness which was peculiar to him, whether Mr. dolph was of age. 'Ask my constitu sir, who sent me here,' retorted which silenced the Speaker and ast ished the other members of the Hous

The little child of Jacob Rouse of Ca den was supposed to be drowned, but, by rubbing and artificial respiration, was restored to consciousness. It had been in the water fifteen minutes.

Roads and Things.

If we were to draw it as mildly as possible we should say that the Red Lake Falls road, south of the river is in a horrid condition. During the spring it was very muddy and being travelled a great deal was all cut up, and in some places is less than a half mile in width, (and not much less either,) and now that the mud is dried up great ruts are left with mounds and ridges of mud as hard as was Pharaoh's heart, (or such a business.) This calls for reform and we would respectfully call the attention of our county dads to the matter to the end that the road may be properly graded and put in shape. We are told that an offer to grade and make a good passable road for five cents per yard has been made which seems to us very reasonable, considering the usual cost of such work. We are informed that the town of Fisher pays six cents per yard for grading and furnishes the grader besides. Be that as it may the fact remains that that road is in fearful condition, calls for repairs and should have them.

FERTILE, Minn., May 25th, 1883.

The heavy showers of last week sent grain right along, and in consequence it is looking finely.

Rev. S. M. Millard, missionary for the American Sunday School Union, organized a Union Sunday School here in our new school house May 13th, with 46 members. We call it the Garfield Union Sunday School. We meet Sundays 3 p. m. Every one is invited to attend.

Under the able supervision of O. L. Hamery, our citizens put the 400 pound bell up in the school house belfry. The bell sounds well, and can be heard quite a distance.

Mr. E. O. Grodevig is painting the school house.

Messrs. Sohler & Co., are putting a new foundation under their mill and preparing to build an addition 14 feet wide and 40 feet long to accommodate their increasing business.

Mine host of the Fertile house, will build to meet the increase of his patronage, a building 18x26, joining the present house.

Mr. A. S. Townsend has dug a fine well on his claim near town, and he is having 60 acres broken.

Messrs. Sohler & Co., sold a very fine young horse to LaDue & Co., which they will use to do their hauling from Beltrami.

Trade in town is good and our merchants wear cheerful faces.

Another blacksmith shop has been built. We have plenty of noise now.

A. A. Kilen's house is rapidly approaching completion.

Mr. Tolef Seamandson will build a large house here soon, which Mr. Gilmour will occupy with his family.

Mr. Otto Kankle has put up a fine addition to his dwelling.

The public here sustain Sheriff Zwickey in his action of shooting the man for whom he had a warrant, believing as they do that his statement of the case is the true one.

We hear some rumors of the removal of O. L. Hamery from this place to Crookston, where he is building a house on Sampson's Woodland Addition.

A man was here this week looking for a place to locate eight German families, hope he will come back.

In the fall of 1881 there was not a single building here, now we have thirteen good buildings, including Sohler & Co.'s grist mill, LaDue & Co.'s large general merchandise store, A. Gilmour's drug store and two blacksmith shops. We think that is a fair showing for a place 16 miles from the railroad.

The sale of stamps from Fertile post office has increased so much since putting on the regular mail service, that we shall soon have a money order office.

Last Monday we counted 22 teams on our streets at one time.

Any one wishing to buy good lands in this vicinity will do well to call on LaDue & Co., who have some fine tracts to sell. One, a fine farm of 320 acres, 110 broken, 90 acres timber, 25 meadow, good house, barn, and well for only $3,200.

Quite a number of our farmers sowed damp wheat and are now out counting the number of spears of wheat to the acre.

LaDue & Co., are preparing to erect a warehouse 18x40 and will take wheat in exchange for goods next fall.

Mrs. J. S. LaDue and A. A. Kilen have been on the sick list, but are now recovering.

Dr. F. H. Stewart of Ada was in our burg last Thursday visiting patients.

Rev Mr. Hunter of Ada preaches here next Sunday at 10:30 a. m.

We are annoyed by not getting our JOURNAL by Friday's mail; we have to wait until the next Tuesday, some one is to blame on the mail business.

Yours, J.

Maple Lake Items.

Boating is all the rage now-a-days.—Fred Date's new schooner is kept busy by the pleasure-seekers.—Jack Confair is going to start a sample room and restaurant.—D. Z. Horton is handling celebrated McCormick machinery and our farmers would do well to consult him.—One of our townsmen was going to Sand Hill and his team was scared to death by the screams of the engine whistle on Kindred's new St. Paul, Brainerd, Duluth, Bismarck, Maple Lake, Red Lake Falls, St. Vincent, Grand Forks, Angus, Devil's Log, St. Hilaire and Go-to-Thunder Railroad line, (LIMITED,) but no lives lost. The granger showed great presence of mind and in some unknown but skillful manner managed to dodge the issue and was saved.—The town of Tilden is building a new school house.—Crops are looking splendidly. St. Hilaire Racket.

From the Spectator.

Prof. Dusso, the sweet singer of Crookston, was in town on Tuesday last, taking orders for musical instruments.

Mr. Christen Olson, has commenced work upon an addition to his hotel. The new structure will be almost as large as the present building and will give Mr. Olson more room for the accommodation of his increased patronage.

Mr. O. H. Nelson, is the name of the gentleman who has joined Mr. E. A. Ranson in the drug business here. Mr. Nelson has several drug stores throughout the country and will be of great benefit to St. Hilaire as he is a man of means and influence.

Mr. Sorsoliel informs us that he expects Mr. Darling up here in a few days when they will commence excavating for their new saw and grist mill. The machinery has all been purchased and will be shipped in here as soon as the Manitoba Company will accept freight for St. Hilaire. The saw mill will be an extensive affair and there will be a lath mill in connection with it. The grist mill will have a capacity of 30 barrels a day and will grind with rollers instead of stones. The capacity of the mill will be increased as the trade demands it. Mr. Darling the senior member of the firm is considered one of the best millwrights in the state, he having built the large mills at Winona of which we understand he is now the principal owner. "Coming events cast their shadows before" and, we think, this is the foreshadow of larger ones to follow.

The commandment "remember the Sabbath day and keep it holy" was not strictly adhered to by Ole Brink and Andrew Soderberg, and a wet Sunday suit and a narrow escape from drowning was the result. They got into an old tub of a boat, intending to cross the river. The current being very swift they were unable to make much headway and when in about the middle of the river the boat, having filled with water, sank, and the occupants were given the choice of getting to shore or drowning. Their cries of help attracted the attention of Mr. W. S. Morse and the editor of this paper who immediately constituted themselves into a life-saving service and hastened to the rescue. After securing a boat they put out and succeeded in heroically rescuing one boot and one shoe of the drowning men from a watery grave. In the meantime the young men had succeeded in reaching terra firma and after getting rid of a quantity of the surplus water they had swallowed, made a solemn vow never again to go boat-riding on Sunday or any other day in a dry-goods box.

CROOKSTON June 5th 1883.

ED. JOURNAL:—I am a stranger in a strange land which is no uncommon circumstance in this new Wonderland, but a trip to Red Lake Falls surprised me when I beheld the wonderful resources of this country. At Gentilly I stopped a few days to look about and found that the favorable reports I had had from them are not exaggerations. Arrived at Red Lake Falls I wandered about the wide streets and winding avenues of the Second Minneapolis in amazement, struck with admiration at sight of the great prosperity of this prosperous metropolis; crossed the suspension bridge to Kretzschmar's Addition where I found the prince of good fellows and boomers, Charlie Kretzschmar, who greeted me cordially and showed me about his thriving city with true and pardonable paternal pride. At Buse & Co's mill I met an old friend in the person of Mr. Rudolph Jacklin, whose greetings were warm and hearty. I was truly glad to meet him for I was seeking a piece of land and I well knew he could help me out if any one could, besides he only charges $25 to put a man on a claim where the owner has gone away to work a few days. Well we had a few glasses of Grover's best and then I met every-body I knew and had a good visit until I got so hungry that I bade them all farewell, you, Mr. Editor, with the rest.

Sol Smith Russell In "Edgewood Folks."

It is with pleasure that we announce the coming of this famous comedian. We clip the following from the Cincinnati Enquirer:

"Edgewood Folks' pleased the Cincinnati folks last evening as much, if not better, than any entertainment the management has offered this season. The first scene is one of the handsomest yet shown at this house, and is as charming and realistic a one as we have seen for years. Mr. Sol Smith Russell is one of the best and most natural humorists on our stage, and as we say in the classics, he "paralyzed" his audience last night, and they seemed to desire to keep him on the stage all the time. His success was instantaneous, and he made one of the greatest hits that our city has witnessed for a long time—one that insures him and his play a fine week's business. The comedy gives some good work to all of the cast, and they take advantage of the opportunity, the support being much above the average. We have not the space for individual mention; all the company were equal to the parts assigned them. Edgewood Folks," the star, and the company have made the hit of the season, and you must go and see it and enjoy yourself.

ORDER OF EXERCISES

Of the Celebration and Picnic St. John's Day June 25th 1883.

The procession will form at Ericsson's Hall at 8:30 a. m., preceded by two marshals, mounted, and the cornet band, will march east on Robert to Broadway, thence south to Fletcher Avenue thence east to Ash thence south to the Catholic church where a solemn high mass will be celebrated, after which an eloquent sermon will be delivered by a distinguished divine from Fon Du Lac, Wis., on the topic of the day. The procession will then proceed to Dobson's grove where a grand dinner will be served. At 2 p. m., a speech will be made by J. B. Paradis, Esq., of St. Paul, and others, after which comes "The Tug of War," an interesting game participated in by 20 or 30 men on a side, the 100 pin race, a foot race of 200 yards, wheel-barrow race, greased pig race and potato race. A fine croquet ground has been prepared for the lovers of that game, the whole to conclude by a pyrotechnical display from a flat boat in the middle of the Red Lake River and a grand torch light procession through the principal streets of the city. In due time a full program will appear with order of exercises in minute detail. No expense or pains have been spared to make this celebration a grand affair. The proceeds are to be applied to liquidate the debt on the Catholic church. Everybody is cordially invited to be present and join in the festivities of the day.

County News.

Red Lake Falls Doings.

From the Messenger.

Paul G. Sletten, of the Crookston land office, was up on Monday and showed which of the "little burgs" he bins his faith to by investing in Red Lake Falls dirt.

Carman Carrings.

Courier.

Spencer Kimball spent several days this week on the Northern Pacific line between Fargo and Detroit. He reports that section as booming in great shape and says that the wheat crop along the road gives evidence of an abundant yield.

Next Monday Carman will lose another of her citizens in the person of Mr. R. D. Kerl. Mr. Kerl has been the principal buyer at this station for the firm of Sterrett, Hill & Childs during the past season, and by a close application to business has performed his duties in an efficient manner and to the entire satisfaction of his employers. He will take a short recreation from his duties here previous to resuming a similar position elsewhere.

Messrs. Kelley, Durning & James Kernan departed Thurday last for to get a glimpse of Dakota dirt, returning the fore part of this week. These gentlemen were some sixty miles west of Fargo, on the line of the Northern Pacific road, and Mr. Kernan informed us yesterday that after looking the landscape o'er they arrived at the conclusion that Minnesota soil was far superior to any that they had seen in that neighborhood, the soil consisting of sand, rocks and small pebbles. James says that all the good land has been taken possession of by the land sharks, who agree to locate settlers thereon for a consideration of $150. Certainly this does not speak well of that much advertised territory, and those of our citizens who may have had the Dakota fever will soon find out that Minnesota soil cannot be beat for agricultural purposes. "Go West" is a good maxim, but there is a danger of overdoing the matter by going too far.

Fisher's Fancies.

From the Bulletin.

Springer Harbaugh's daughter, Miss Mamie C., was married to Lieut. L. C. Brooks of the Fifth Cavalry, May 29th.

An important transfer of property took place yesterday. The lumber yard owned by C. W. Waggoner was sold to the Lanterman Bros. Hillsboro, Dak., who are now in posession.

Never in the history of the valley were crops looking better than at this writing. There is quite a percentage of land not plowed, but all land seeded is booming in every sense of the word. Look out for forty bushel reports next harvest.

THE POLK COUNTY TEACHERS' INSTITUTE.

Special Report for the Polk County Journal:

June 11th, 1:30. p. m. The Polk County Teachers Institute opened with singing by the members—Miss Addie Davis presiding at the organ. After which Superintendent Carruth introduced Professor McCleary, of the Mankato Normal school, and Allen Grey, of the St. Cloud Normal school.

The latter, in a peculiarly easy and happy little speech acknowledged the introduction and at once inspired the teachers with confidence in his ability and good will. Though but few words were said they quickly understood that the end and aim of this gathering was not to find out "how much each one knows," nor to ride hobbies nor air peculiarities, but to introduce fresh fields of thought, new and useful methods in our daily work, to elevate the "calling" from drudgery into bright and interesting paths, therefore as teachers we ask your hearty co-operation, careful attention and assistance. Sufficient to say when the Professor resigned the floor to his coworker every person knew and felt that they had a master mind to lead them. The first exercise of Institute work was conducted by Prof McCleary, after giving to each person a number whereby he is to be designated throughout the entire session. Even this little incident brought forcibly to our minds how extremely fallible old scholars can be themselves, for the numbers became mixed at the first call. If some of our city urbins could have seen their teachers forget, I imagine they would have been delighted.

The Prof. handled his topic, arithmetic, in a business-like manner, deducing the fact by positive examples, that children should be taught rapidity of calculation and correctness of execution by repeated exercises in the same line of thought, day after day. It is "line upon line and precept upon precept," although the head and heart of the instructor wearies, this must go on. Applying this deduction to the class it was pleasant to see the interest with which they listened and how heartily each performed their little sum with the evident delight and glory of being up first. (Little pupils on big plan.) Evidently the same disposition in this school of teachers that we see in our school rooms every day. The Professor has a happy faculty of imparting knowledge and is up in the ways and means of any topic, he undertakes. Exercise 2d—Geography—by Grey, the chief deduction evident to to us all being that too much of it is taught and in too loose a manner, also that it cannot be properly taught from maps alone, globes are necessary of which more anon.

SCHOOL ECONOMY.

EXERCISE 3d.—Wherein Prof. McCleary gave some advice as to engaging schools, securing certificates, examinations, professional courtesy, underbidding, etc., all of which will be seriously considered by his hearers, and the observance of which will raise them in the estimation of the public and of themselves, followed by a short semi-lecture by P. Grey emphasizing the the same, and extending these ideas until he reached the question, when is a person educated? what is education? Then quoting from the Prussians beautiful definition, "Education is the equable and harmonious evolution of all the powers of our being." Upon what material do teachers work? Answers of the mind, the mental faculties, and even the body, (which is literally true, perhaps, in one sense) to all of which the Professor slowly shook his head, and saying yes, but go deeper yet, farther still, and tell it all in one grand idea—call it human nature which manifests itself under three distinct aspects—the physical, mental and moral attributes.

Carman Carvings.

Courier.

A number of immigrants encamped to the north of Carman Tuesday night They were making the journey in the old fashioned way, their stock all being in excellent condition.

Mr. E. D. Childs made a short business trip through Dakota and part of Montana Territories last week, and reports that section as being far below what one might expect from the manner in which the country is being advertised.

Last Monday Mr. Ira Gallagher and wife left for their farm purchased last spring near St. Hilaire from E. D. Childs. Ira will return in the course of a week or two, but it is the intention of Mrs. Gallagher to remain on the farm some time.

Uncle Daniel Cameron has been busily engaged for some weeks in overhauling and repairing his threshing machines preparatory to the fall rush in that line. Uncle Dan can do good work threshing and is thoroughly acquainted with the art.

James Kernan and Charles Durning were through that section of land bordering on Clearwater and Poplar rivers the latter part of last week. Some beautiful country was discovered and the grain all seems to be in splendid condition, giving indications of a bountiful harvest. They failed to find any land suitable for agricultural purposes that had not already been taken possession of.

Some parties entered the house of James Kernan Wednesday evening and proceeded to go through one of the trunks that was left open by one of the young ladies that are spending the summer with the family. A noise was heard at the time and upon investigation it was found that some $22.00 in money and other articles were missing. No clue to the perpetrators of the theft have as yet been discovered, although diligent efforts are being made to discover their whereabouts.

St. Vincent Herald: Bro. Douglas, of the International has been nominated as the Conservative Candidate for the Local Legisture of Manitoba, for the Electoral Division of Emerson. Mr. F. E. Burnham is the Greenway Candidate. The polling is fixed for the 23rd inst., and everything seems to be ripe for a red hot contest. We are informed that the chances for our fraternal Bro.'s election are very good. We shall be more than pleased after election to be able to congratulate him.

Peterson's Magazine for July is on our table, ahead of all others, and even more brilliant than usual. The leading illustrated article is entitled "Where Colonel Newcome Died," and will be read, with the greatest interest, by every admirer of Thackeray. The principal story is "A Fifth Avenue Romance," a novelet of which the first four chapters are given, and which, besides being written with great spirit, is evidently from the pen of one entirely at home in the society she describes. The other stories, however, are all exceptionally good, and especially one by Frank Lee Benedict, "From a Pretty Girl's Note-Book," which is the best of its kind we have seen for a long time. The embellishments consist of a steel-engraving, "Little Mischief," after a picture by Sir Joshua Reynolds; a mammoth, steel, colored fashion-plate; "The Reaper;" "With Her Groom;" and nearly fifty wood-engravings of fashions, embroidery, etc., etc. A new volume begins with this number, affording an excellent opportunity to subscribe. We really do not see how any lady can do without this magazine. It combines more, and of a better quality, at a less price, than any other. The terms are but Two Dollars a year, with great deductions to clubs, and handsome premiums to persons getting up clubs. Specimens are sent gratis, if written for, to those wishing to get up clubs. The little child of Felix Fournet, of the Central House, met with an accident on Saturday by which its leg was broken. Its nurse, while carrying him in her arms, let it drop upon the floor in some way. The child did not seem to be very seriously injured at the time, and it was not until Monday morning that Dr. Dampier was summoned, who found that its leg was broken and set it properly. The child, at last accounts, was doing well.

The Sol Smith Russell Comedy Company appeared in Ericsson's Hall on Tuesday evening in "Edgewood Folks." This company is one of the best if not the very best that ever appeared before a Crookston audience. Sol Smith Russell, in the title role was simply immense and his every appearance on the stage was the signal for loud applause. Should that company ever favor Crookston we can assure them a full house and a hearty welcome.

The Red Lake Falls Messenger says that Mrs. Kretzschmar is able to ride out.—Red Lake Falls has a brass band, Fitz Gerke is leader.—Main Street is being graded its entire length.—Abraham & Miles are clearing and improving several streets on their addition.—Detling, Hayes & Hamery have received a stump-puller and will soon put it to work. (It beats Doc. Thomas yanking snags.)—Town property is jumping up.—Market square is being improved by private subscription.

A sad accident occurred in the town of Woodside one day last week by which a little girl, aged fourteen named Emma Woork, received a severe and perhaps fatal gunshot wound. It seems that in company with her brother a young man of 17, she was going home from her uncle's residence. The young man was carrying a shot gun and following her at about ten feet distance, when, in passing under a tree the gun was in some manner discharged, its contents entering the girl's side just above the hip. She was taken to her uncle's residence and Dr. Cable sent for. Before his arrival, however, her uncle had hitched up and taken the little sufferer to her own home and as yet we have been unable to get the doctor's report of the case. It is considered by those who best know to be a serious case. It furnishes also a sad warning against the careless use of firearms which some are wont to handle as if they were sticks or crow-bars, incapable of harm.

On Saturday last, Mrs. Anthony Lesaur started for Red Lake Falls in a lumber wagon with a neighbor. When they had crossed the wagon bridge and were near Allen's brickyard a passing train scared the team which in its endeavors to get away overturned the wagon and threw its occupants to the ground. A breaking plow was thrown upon Mrs. Lesaur injuring her severely if not fatally. She was taken up unconscious and taken to her residence corner of Broadway and Loring Avenue and Dr. Gaboury hasteily summoned. She recovered consciousness but has been unable to help herself since the accident.

Koeppe is doing lots of plastering. On Wednesday he was hauled out to M. E. Bartlett's residence where he will leave his work on the walls in good shape.

The Auditor and Treasurer of Polk County have been rushed with work of late. They have worked until 11 or 12 o'clock every night for the past four weeks and still have lots to do.

J. W. Palmer, of Angus, was in on Wednesday with some prime beef cattle for sale. Shows that J. W. has struck the key-note and dont intend to comfine himself to wheat alone.

B. S. Fogg informs the JOURNA that he has sold one New Era Grader a day for the past two weeks. That looks encuraging. It looks as though our county appreciates a good thing, and as though we were bound to have good roads and dry soil in the future.

No expense nor pains have been spared to get up a big time on St. John's Day celebration. A big program has been prepared and a grand time is anticipated. Reduced rates have been secured on all railroads leading into the city and hundreds will avail themselves of the opportunity to visit our city on the 25th inst at one and one fifth fare for the round trip. All are cordially invited.

The prospects for a saw mill or two seem bright. Mr. T. B. Walker returned from Grand Forks convinced that nothing could be done there and parties are now out, along the river to secure of property owners the right to travel along the river banks in the interest of logs. We are told that the logs will be boomed here, mills erected and the manufacture of pine lumber commenced. Should this result in cheapening lumber it would be of inestimable benefit to our city and county.

The lovers of fast horses are having fine sport every evening on the race course speeding their trotters. Many are developing a high rate of speed. The old track is all out of repairs and as it is not to be used as a track it will never be made better. Like all great bodies the new fair ground business moves slowly, so that in a short time there will be no place except the public highway left to exercise the horses. At the meeting in the city hall to-night everybody interested in lively steppers should be present and subscribe for a share of the capital stock. It would take but a few more shares to secure the grounds.

Three Bear Hunts.

"You see, boys, this is how it all happened. I went down to press hay in Mauricetown, over in Jersey, a few years ago. They told me that the place was overrun with bears, and that the governor offered a reward of $25 for every bear's hide brought in to him. I borrowed a gun and filled it to the muzzle with bullets, because I wasn't goin' to take no chances, d'ye see? It was a dark night when half a dozen of us set out. I'll never forget that night. You couldn't see your nose afore ye. First of all we got into a big swamp, and I got plastered with mud from head to heels, and one man Rueben Smith, said he wouldn't go no further with us on sich a dangerous expedition, because he had a large family to home to support. I said that I thought Reub had more heart in him than to leave us like that. Not far from Mauricetown we were passin' some bushes, when all of a sudden there was the most awful yells set up that ever you hear, and at the same time there was a fearful growling coming out of the bushes. I made a bee-line for home. I ran for a full mile, and fell down at the door, done up, and I was taken in 'most dead. I had to get somethin' strong to revive me, and then one of the fellows came in gaspin,' and with his boots torn, and said that the bear had bitten him, and he'd just escaped with his bare life. No that ain't no joke.

"Well," continued Dick, "I was determined not to be beat, so we made another agreement to meet the next night and have that bear. If it was dark the first night it was like mixed pitch and colored man this night. We went first into the meadows, where the fields were laid out in squares and separated by deep ditches. I couldn't have seen a darned bear if he was standin' under my nose. All at once one fellow let out the awfullest yell ye ever heard. It made my flesh creep all over. One fellow ran up agin' me and I thought he was the bear, and hollered too like a good 'un. I made tracks across the meadow and fell into a ditch, where there was three foot of water. My gun was at the bottom of the ditch and we fished it out. I was no sooner on the other side of the ditch when I sees something big covered with fur, and the dogs commenced to growl and the other fellows shouted that the bear was there. I bolted for home, one of the dogs followin' me all the way, and I thought his breathin' was the breathin' of the bear, and I thought it was all over with me this time. I could see the red light of the Mauricetown drawbridge ahead, and I made for that, tumbling into ditches, trippin' up in holes and generally coverin' myself with mud and bruises. I got over the drawbridge, leaped over the barnyard fence and making for in doors when I saw an infernal elder bush movin' and I thought that was the bear again, and hollered for assistance. The folks came out and helped me in. The old farmer said I'd had a narrow escape, but not to lose heart, because I would soon get used to the Jersey bear huntin'. I went to bed sore and mad and determined that cart horses wouldn't get me out to another bear hunt.

When next day came, Reub Smith came to me and said he heerd I had shown first-rate grit at bear hunting, and that if it wasn't for his family he would join the boys again that night, for they had located a darned big bear near by. To make a long story short, I went out again that night with four other fellows. We took the swamp road, as we did on the first night. I suddenly saw two objects movin'. They were covered with hair and looked to me as big as elephants. I shouted out: 'Here they are! Two of them! Look out!' Ike White shouted: 'Give them both barrels!' I blazed away. One of the big objects tumbled down and I felt kinder proud, and said: 'That's one hide, anyhow.' The other, however, came right on, and as I knew I had nothin' in my gun I did the streak-of-lightning-act and made for the barn-yard, where I dropped down exhausted. The old farmer gave me a big glass of whisky to pull me round, and then I told him I had been chased by one monstrous bear, but that I had killed the other. He shook hands and said he was proud of me. Next mornin' all Mauricetown was grinnin' at me. Would you believe it? These Mauricetown boys had put up a job on me. They had covered themselves with buffalo robes, they had made the dogs yowl by nippin' them. Reub Smith had played bear in the bushes, and they had carefully drawn my cartridges on the last night before I set out.

"That was my first and last bear hunt you bet. Them Mauricetown fellows played the second game on a Philadelphian. He was an old man and a cripple, and do you know they scared him so bad and made him jump so many ditches and run so fast that they cured him, and he is able to walk just as well as I can now."—Philadelphia Times.

The April Foolishness.

Dr. Langer states that the fat of a child "contains less ollic acid, but more palmitic and stearic acid than that of adults, besides being richer in the butyric and caproic acids." Perhaps this is what causes the infant to yell so vociferously during the night, but we can't always tell. It may be the richness of the butyric and caproic acids, and it may be a displaced pin.

A fair young damsel went into the business place of one of Troy's most worthy and kindly merchants, and expressed a desire to purchase a certain article. Several specimens were shown her, and she finally made choice of one as meeting her wishes. She hesitated a moment, and then asked: "Do you make a reduction to ministers?" "Yes," replied a gentlemanly attendant, "are you a minister's wife? "No-o-o." was the blushing response, "but I expect to be soon." The reduction was granted. —Troy Times.

Half way anyhow: "You're getting quite bald, old man; you try rum." "Rum! So I have. I've bought gallons of it." "Ah, I see; but then, p'r'aps, you could never get it any further than your mouth!"—London Judy.

Prohibition items: "Wake me up darling, to-night and give me a toddy," said an Austin inebriate to his wife, as they were about to retire for the night. "But how will I know when you want one?" "You can't make a mistake, I am always thirsty when I am woke up."—Texas Siftings.

An ear for music." "Yes," said Fenderson, "I've got quite an ear for music: "You have quite an ear, sure enough," said Fogg, "but I wasn't sure it was for music. I didn't know but it was intended for a windmill."—Boston Transcript.

Her comparison: "Here I've been talking for an hour," exclaimed an auctioneer, "and I haven't got an offer.' "Half an hour, indeed!" murmured an elderly maiden. "What's half an hour to many long years and still no hope of an offer?"—Boston Transcript.

Climatic: A Boston lady who has an orange grove in Florida was speaking enthusiastically one day of the climate there. "But how is it for invalids?" asked a friend: "should you want to go there for your health?" The lady instantly replied: "Oh, I shouldn't want to go to heaven for my health."

FARMERS' COLUMN.

Pertaining to Cookery.

Rhubarb pies are much improved if baked in a very slow oven. If great care is taken in wetting the edges of the crust and pressing them together, the rhubarb need not first be stewed, but may be put raw in the crust. If a little flour is mixed with the sugar used in the pies, it will thicken the juice and keep it from running out over the top of the pie.

Steak Pie.—Cut a tender steak into thin slices and sprinkle them with a little finely chopped mushroom, onion and parsley, season well with pepper and salt, rubbing the seasoning thoroughly over them on both sides, then roll up each slice of beef. Put into a saucepan a layer of bacon, then the rolls, and just enough water to cover them; simmer gently until tender, but not overdone, with the lid on the saucepan. Have ready a pie-dish lined and bordered with paste, put in the meat and a few hard-boiled eggs quartered; reduce the gravy, pour it over the meat, cover with paste and bake in a quick oven.

Excellent Cup Cake.—One cup of butter, three cups of powdered sugar, five eggs beaten separately, one cup of sweet milk, four cups of sifted flour, juice of one lemon and the grated rind of half, two small teaspoonfuls of baking powder. Cover with frosting flavored with lemon.

Frothed Chocolate.—Three tablespoonfuls of Baker's chocolate grated, one cup of boiling water, three pints of new milk, the whites of two eggs beaten stiff. Put on the milk to scald, wet up the chocolate with the hot water and when the milk is hot add the chocolate; let simmer 10 minutes, stirring frequently, then boil up once; take from the fire, sweeten to taste and stir in the two beaten whites. Whip the whites of two or three eggs to a froth, add just the smallest quantity of powdered sugar, put into a pitcher and cover the top of each cup of chocolate with this meringue before serving.

Mock Mince Pies—One cup of vinegar, one cup of water, one cup of molasses, one cup of sugar, piece of butter the size of an egg, two teaspoons of cinnamon, one of cloves, two large slices of bread broken up fine, and simmered with the other ingredients. Raisins may be added to the taste and are nice if chopped; one-half teaspoon of salt. The crust may be cut off the bread. This amount will make four pies if they are not too large.

House Furnishing Hints.

There is a decided tendency towards lighter colors for carpets, for upholstery goods and for wall coverings. Soft neutral tints are chosen in carpets, says Harper's Bazar in an article on house furnishing, and the object is to avoid all striking effects, both in design and color so that the carpet may serve as an unobtrusive background for the furniture. Black and very dark grounds are disappearing from the carpets except those of halls, libraries and dining rooms, while those of drawing rooms, parlors, reception rooms, chambers and sitting rooms have subdued shades of old blue, olive, India red, sage green, ecru or golden brown; the terra cotta, Sevres blue, Pompeiian rose, and imperial yellows used last year are still seen, with pearl, sky blue, and shrimp colors for the lightest grounds. The designs are small and intricate, being made up of geometric figures, or palms, latticed bars, tapestry patterns, conventionalized flowers of small sizes, oriental designs copied literally from antique rugs, or else the entire carpet may be a single plain color, or a melange of many colors without any set pattern. All carpets are bordered, and the same good designs and quiet colors shown in royal Axminsters may be found in the most inexpensive ingrains. The serviceable Wilton carpets are chosen for smaller drawing-rooms, halls, dining rooms and libraries, in mingled patterns of two tones of one color for the center, while there are several colors in the wide border. Moquette carpets are now ranged among the showy and inexpensive carpets, as they resemble Axminsters in appearance, but it must be added, they are far less durable. They may be had in the fashionable rug designs, but are more often seen in the light floriated designs that the French consider so decorative. Body Brussels carpets for the entire house are chosen by people of taste with means to furnish well, but who do not care to follow every change in fashion; in these carpets the figures are well woven through, so that the colors may be seen on the wrong side.

A Good Whitewash Recipe.

If lime is slaked with skimmed milk instead of water, it will not rub off, and will have a glossy appearance. Whitewash is the best coating for walls covered with common lime mortar, and kalsomine for walls covered with hard finish. If the ceiling has been blackened with smoke, a little dissolved indigo added to the whitewash will hide the smoky surface. To make a stone color, take for half a bushel of lime four pounds of raw umber and two pounds of lampback. For a light pink, stir in Spanish brown till the color is what is desired. A lemon-colored wash may be obtained by using chromo yellow; a fawn color by adding to a half bushel of lime one pound of Indian red, four pounds umber and one pound of lampblack. To make the whitewash, slake half a bushel of lime in a cask, with hot water or milk; add half a pound of whiting, one pound of glue dissolved in hot water, and a peck of salt dissolved in water. Have a wire across the pail containing the wash, when used, so that the brush may be pressed against it when taken from the whitewash. This will keep drops and spatters from spoiling the floor. Use only a little wash at a time, and dip the brush perpendicularly into the pail.

About Calla Lilies.

There are few persons caring anything for plants who do not have a calla lily. Many will have one in preference to any other plant, It is largely grown for winter flowers, and is of the easiest culture. It is a native of the Cape of Good Hope, and was named after L. C. Richard, a French botanist, hence its botanical name—Richardia Ethiopica. It was first brought into England in 1631. The popular name, calla was given to it by Pliny. The calla blooms during winter and spring, and is much used for Easter decorations, the flowers usually being abundant about that time. It is sometimes called Easter lily and lily of the Nile. It needs rich, moist soil, plenty of water and light; and, although it does well with little heat, the higher temperature it can have the better. It is often seen in aquaria, where it is grown in almost pure water. After the plants are through flowering they should be given a season of rest, say from June or July to September. Turn the pot on its side in a shady place and gradually withhold the water from it. In September repot in fresh soil. After it has started growing give plenty of water and light. They can be grown and flowered all the year round if the plants are repotted as often as necessary, but it is following nature more closely to give a month or so of rest; they flower better for it. The leaves should be washed or syringed occasionally to keep them free from dust. Callas are propagated by offsets, which are taken from the parent bulb at the time of potting. These bulblets are grown in pots for a season before they are large enough to flower; or started and grown in small pots until spring, and then planted in the open ground they will make good-sized bulbs by fall. Before frost they are lifted, rested for a month or so and started for spring sales or Easter flowers.

Carpets or No Carpets.

This is not a very easy question to answer, as the circumstances differ greatly. I can make a few suggestions that may be of use. There is a paper made expressly for putting on the floor before the carpet is laid. It is not expensive, and will last a lifetime. It takes all the dust, and makes house cleaning much easier. A carpet sweeper is of great comfort. The ordinary broom sweeps the dust up into the room and covers the sweeper as well as the furniture and curtains with dust, which never gets quite out of the room. Another plan for keeping clean is to have a carpet that does not cover the entire floor; a space of two feet is left, and the heavy furniture does not need to be moved. The carpet can be taken up and beaten as often as convenient, and the floor mopped up. If the floor is good, and can be painted, this is a good plan. Such a carpet, must be heavy, and can be lined with bagging or coarse brown straw bed covering to give it weight. In Germany the painted floor is wiped up every morning, and the smaller mats are beaten. In France the beautiful hard wood floors are waxed and polished; after all is finished and the room dusted, there is a sweet, clean odor and a shining polish to everything, that is the very perfection of comfort.—Correspondence Country Gentleman.

Orchard Grass.

F. D. Curtis, in the New York Tribune makes the following statements in favor of orchard grass: Those who keeps pigs will find orchard grass best for permanent pig pasture, on account of its starting so early in spring and its continuous growth during the entire season. It is the least affected by drouth of any grass with which I am acquainted, and it will also furnish the largest amount of fresh seed. Clover and timothy will furnish a greater bulk of hay, but neither of them, and especially timothy, which is very poor, will furnish anything like the amount of after-growth. Orchard grass on rich land can be mown three times in one year and of course when used for pasture there is the same vigorous growth. I have known it to furnish a good fresh bite three days after being cut close to the ground, hence I am satisfied that it is superior to any other grass for permanent pasture. It will not run out like clover and timothy, as its long fibrous roots take a rank and deep hold of the ground, uniting at the top in a tussock or crown from which numberless blades of grass grow.

Modern Dairy Farming.

Modern dairy farming, says the Hon. Hirman Smith, of Wisconsin, starts out with keeping one cow on four acres, and this should be the pass-word to every dairy lodge—"one cow to four acres;" and this should be rapidly reduced until the undoubted possibility is reached of keeping one to every acre.

One of the principles of modern dairy farming is to have our cows give the most milk when dairy goods are at the highest price, which is invariably in winter. It has been repeatedly demonstrated that a good herd of cows coming into milk in September, October and November will, in the average, give from 4,500 to 6,000 pounds of milk annually. The milk is worth, to sell at a factory, or to manufacture into butter or cheese, $1.30 per 100 pounds, or $58.50 as the average for each cow. In other words, dairy farming with one cow to eight acres on 160 acres produces $1,100, modern dairy farming with one cow to four acres produces $2,260, an increase of $1,500, by an outlay for feed and help—a net profit of $540, a sum sufficient to raise the price of land from $50 per acre to $100 per acre.

A fundamental condition of successful farming is large crops of corn, not less than two acres of fodder and four acres of field corn for every ten cows, or a total of twenty-four acres for forty cows. All the manure of the farm should be evenly placed on these twenty-four acres during the winter, and the land plowed previous to the 10th of May and thoroughly harrowed, the corn planted immediately thereafter with a horse drill, the rows three and one-half feet apart, and the kernels from seven to nine inches apart, and cultivated well before the corn comes up with a fine-tooth harrow. Frequently thereafter cultivate until the 10 of July, at which time, if the work has been honestly done, it will be free from weeds with never a hoe in the field, and it is almost certain to produce fifty bushels per acre of shelled corn and thirty tons of fodder. It takes less labor to raise twenty-four acres of corn as described above, than to raise half that amount planted in hills and the cultivation deferred until you can see the rows.

Better Buildings.

The better buildings which are a leading essential of our improved agriculture must not only be warm in winter but also wholesome to live in. Pure air must constantly surround all breathing animals if we would keep them in health. It is the oxygen of the air that changes blue blood to red in the lungs; good air is even more necessary than good food. Milk from cows imprisoned in a close stable reeking with the odors of filth and corruption is not safe for human beings. Disease germs soon die in pure dry air but in damp air they live long and are ever ready to take possession of animal life through the lungs and otherwise. Disease germs lay hold of us more readily when asleep than when at work, showing the necessity of abundant air in sleeping rooms. Stables should receive pure air by means of boxes extending from the floor to the roof or by other outside connection with the pure atmosphere of heaven. Our house cellars, too, with their stores of vegetables, fruits, beef and pork barrels and a codfish hanging at the head of the stair to give a "body" to the air, should have plenty of open windows for the free winds to pass through, even on warm days in winter.—New York Tribune.

Last Week's Failures.

Bradstreet's Journal furnishes the following: There were 148 failures in the United States reported to Bradstreet during the past week; 12 more than the preceding week, 18 more than the corresponding week of 1882, and 66 more than the same week of 1881. The failures generally were not important. The Grafton Iron company of Pittsburg, Pa., and Letonia, Ohio, asked an extension, and A. O. Tinsman, & Co., coke manufacturers of Pittsburg, assigned. In the principal trades the bulk of the failures of the week were among grocers, general traders and liquor dealers.

RELIABLE TESTIMONY.

Philadelphia, Pa., Sept. 6, 1881.

Hop Bitters Co.

I am 74 years old, have lived 34 years in Philadelphia, and well known among Germans. I have been troubled 12 years with a white swelling on my right foot, and getting worse every year, and very painful, and breaking out in hot weather. I consulted several doctors and they told me it was incurable and I would have to take it with me in the grave. Some time ago I lost my appetite, was costive, had headache, and fever, in fact was very sick. I saw in the German Democrat that Hop Bitters was what I needed. I got a bottle, took it one week and was as well again as ever, and to my greatest surprise right from the first, my swelling went down gradually and I taking another bottle got entirely well of it. The wife of my neighbor had two such swellings on her legs and three bottles cured her. I think this is a great triumph for your bitters.

John Stoll,
No. 4 Young's Alley, above Willow St.

Stippshill, Ind., Nov. 13, 1881.

Dear Sirs—I have read so much about Hop Bitters and always being afflicted with neuralgia, weakness, diseased stomach, never having much health, I tried a couple bottles; it has strengthened and helped me more than any medicine or doctor. I am now on my third bottle and am thankful that it has helped me. I will advise all that are afflicted to give it a trial.

I have not been well for three years, tried almost every kind of patent medicines and no less than seven doctors, one of Elmira, N. Y., none have done me any good. I finally tried your Hop Bitters and found them just the thing. I have praised them so highly there is a great number here who use them with great benefit and satisfaction.

Very Respectfully Yours, R. Hunt.

Gentlemen—The "Hop Bitters" meet with large sales and give general satisfaction, one case in particular you should know of. Mr. John B. Green, 728 Spring Garden St., Phila., Pa., has been suffering from kidney affection, which superinduced rheumatism. He tried physicians and remedies in vain. He was obliged to take morphine to induce sleep; his trouble was so great. Reading your advertisement in the "Christian at Work," he was prevailed upon by one of his daughters to try it. Three bottles effected a cure, and now he is an enthusiast for "Hop Bitters." He is one of the oldest residents in the locality named; and known as a gentleman of unusual probity.

I have been troubled with vertigo since last July, and have suffered greatly every night after any considerable exertion from dizziness and blindness. I tried two bottles of Hop Bitters, and since then have been entirely relieved.

Hop Bitters Co. June 15, 1881.

I have been suffering five years past with neuralgia, liver complaint, dyspepsia and kidney complaint, and I have doctored with fourteen different doctors who did me no good. At last I tried Hop Bitters, and after I used a few bottles I received a great benefit from them, and if I had used Hop Bitters regularly I would have been well before. I know them to be the best medicine in the world for nervous diseases of all kinds.

Wicked For Clergymen.

"I believe it to be all wrong and even wicked for clergymen or other public men to be led into giving testimonials to quack doctors or patent medicines, but when a really meritorious article composed of valuable remedies known to all, and that all physicians use and trust in daily, we should freely commend it. I therefore cheerfully and heartily commend Hop Bitters for the good they have done me and my friends, firmly believing they have no equal for family use, I will not be without them.

Rev. B. R.——, Washington, D. C.

A good Baptist clergymen of Bergen, N. Y., a strong temperance man, suffered with kidney trouble, neuralgia and dizziness almost to blindness, over two years after he was advised that Hop Bitters would cure him, because he was afraid of and predjudiced against the word "bitters." Since his cure he says none need fear but trust in Hop Bitters.

My wife and daughter were made healthy by the use of Hop Bitters and I recommend them to my people.—Methodist Clergyman, Mexico, N. Y.

I have severe attacks of Gravel and Kidney trouble; was unable to get any medicine or doctor to cure me until I used Hop Bitters, and they cured me in a short time.—A distinguished lawyer and temperance orator of Wayne County, N. Y.

A Story of Gen. Dix.

An incident somewhat similar to "Shoot him on the spot," is related of General Dix during his occupancy of Fort McHenry: The condition of Baltimore was like that of a volcano intent on eruption; signs pointed distinctly to a terrible outbreak as imminent; and had blood begun to flow in the city it would soon have been flowing all over the unhappy state. What the commanding general would do in case of an outbreak was anxiously asked; the rumor was that in such an event he would shell the town. A deputation of ladies went to Fort McHenry to see him and remonstrate. They were received with the courtesy characteristic of the general in his dealings with the sex. After some conversation he invited them to a walk around the walls. At a certain point they came upon an immense columbiad, the largest in the fort. Here the general stopped and said: "Ladies, there will be no trouble in the city unless it is created by persons of your own social position; the common people will not rise until they see the aristocracy of Baltimore moving: The safety of the town and the lives of its citizens are, therefore, substantially in your hands. Will you oblige me by mounting these steps, looking over the top of that gun, and noting the place to which it points." The ladies complied, and one exclaimed, "It points to Monument Square!" "Yes," replied the general, "and I now tell you that if there should be an uprising in Baltimore, I shall be compelled to try to put it down; and that gun is the first that I shall fire." There was no rising in Baltimore.

Mr. Baron Fairchild of Union City, Ind., writes: "I have used Dr. Guysott's Yellow Dock and Sarsaparilla [illegible] for kidney complaint and dyspepsia. [illegible] and well before for a long time."

Consumption Can Be Cured.

Read what Mr. William C. Digges, a merchant of Bowling Green, Va., writes under date April 4th, 1881. He says: I firmly believe that Allen's Lung Balsam will and has cured consumption if taken in time and proper care be taken of the patient both in suitable food and clothing. Six years ago my mother was attacked with pneumonia. The attending physician "some time after," told me that the disease had settled on her lungs and that she had the consumption. Not believing that a permanent cure could be effected, but thinking I might be able to get an expectorant not containing opium which would afford some relief, I inquired of a druggist at Richmond, Va., if he had any medicine not containing opium, that was a good expectorant. He then recommended Allen's Lung Balsam, which I purchased and induced my mother to try. Before she had taken the first bottle the improvement in her condition was so marked that I purchased three more bottles. The attending physician seeing the beneficial effects, recommended its continued use, and in about twelve months her lungs were pronounced cured. I think you can claim for your medicine the following: Expectoration without irritation, and healing of the lungs by keeping them free from foreign substances, thus arresting and curing this dread disease. Mr. Digges says he writes because he wants us to know that Allen's Lung Balsam is doing good.

A Case Not Beyond Help.

Dr. H. H. Hinsdale, Kenawee, Ill., advises us of a remarkable cure of consumption. He says: "A neighbor's wife was attacked with violent lung disease, and pronounced beyond help from Quick Consumption. As a last resort the family was persuaded to try Dr. William Hall's Balsam for the lungs. To the astonishment of all, by the time she had used one half dozen bottles she was about the house doing her own work. I saw her at her worst and had no idea she could recover.

INDIGESTION.

Its Relation to Diseases—Causes and Remedies.

The important relation of indigestion to many diseases which people suffer is not sufficiently realized. Difficulty in breathing, occurring spontaneously, or on slight exertion, may be caused by indigestion. Indigestion causes alterations in the general nutrition of the body, which are manifested in various ways among which are the following: Anæmia, or a depraved state of the blood, involving a deficiency of the red globules of the blood, and causing persons thus affected to be unnaturally pale, especially about the lips; decay of the teeth; grayness of the hair; excessive liability to inflammation, from slight causes of the mucous membranes especially the eyes and throat; to which may be added, in cases of those predisposed to such affections, liability to gout and rheumatism, and affections of the lungs and kidneys. Consumption has frequently been regarded as due in many cases to long continued derangement of the digestion, whereby the general nutrition of the system has become impaired. The inflammation of the mucous membrane of the throat, known as "clergyman's sore throat," is a product of indigestion, and the removal of the cause by the adoption of a suitable dietary exercise in the open air, and observance of the laws of health generally will be the best treatment of it. Indigestion is the cause of various alterations in the skin, manifested by general coldness or chilliness, especially of the extremities, by changes in its color or texture, which may be earthy or sallow in tint, or dry and coarse, and by various eruptions, among which are the well-known eczema, acne, impetigo and nettle rash. Most of the cases of skin diseases affecting children are best treated by attention to the diet, making the diet easily digestible and sufficiently limited to insure complete digestion. The causes of indigestion may be due to the food or condition of the stomach. The food may be defective in quality. There may be excess or deficiency of the normal ingredients, saccharine, starchy, albuminous, or fatty, or some of the naturally indigestible materials which form a part of all food. The food may be introduced in an indigestible form on account of the defects in the cooking of it, or imperfect mastication, or from its having undergone putrefaction or fermentation, which arrests the functions of the stomach. Imperfect mastication of food is a very common cause of indigestion among Americans. Eating too much is probably the most common of all causes of indigestion. The secretion of the gastric juice in the stomach seems to be proportioned to the amount of material required for the nourishment of the system. Food taken in excess of this amount acts as a foreign substance undergoing fermentation and putrefaction, and occasioning much disturbance in the system. Much may be done for the cure of indigestion by eating very abstemiously of suitable food, thoroughly masticated, taking exercise in the open air, breathing pure air, and observing the laws of health generally. The amount of food should be reduced until the quantity is reached which the stomach can digest without evincing any symptoms of indigestion.—Phrenological Journal.

A NOTED BUT UNTITLED WOMAN.

[From the Boston Globe.]

Messrs. Editors:—

The above is a good likeness of Mrs. Lydia E. Pinkham, of Lynn, Mass., who above all other human beings may be truthfully called the "Dear Friend of Woman," as some of her correspondents love to call her. She is zealously devoted to her work, which is the outcome of a life-study, and is obliged to keep six lady assistants, to help her answer the large correspondence which daily pours in upon her, each bearing its special burden of suffering, or joy at release from it. Her Vegetable Compound is a medicine for good and not evil purposes. I have personally investigated it and am satisfied of the truth of this.

On account of its proven merits, it is recommended and prescribed by the best physicians in the country. One says: "It works like a charm and saves much pain. It will cure entirely the worst form of falling of the uterus, Leucorrhœa, irregular and painful Menstruation, all Ovarian Troubles, Inflammation and Ulceration, Floodings, all Displacements and the consequent spinal weakness, and is especially adapted to the Change of Life."

It permeates every portion of the system, and gives new life and vigor. It removes faintness, flatulency, destroys all craving for stimulants, and relieves weakness of the stomach. It cures Bloating, Headaches, Nervous Prostration, General Debility, Sleeplessness, Depression and Indigestion. That feeling of bearing down, causing pain, weight and backache, is always permanently cured by its use. It will at all times, and under all circumstances, act in harmony with the law that governs the female system.

It costs only $1. per bottle or six for $5., and is sold by druggists. Any advice required as to special cases, and the names of many who have been restored to perfect health by the use of the Vegetable Compound, can be obtained by addressing Mrs. P., with stamp for reply, at her home in Lynn, Mass.

"Mrs. Pinkham's Liver Pills," says one writer, "are the best in the world for the cure of Constipation, Biliousness and Torpidity of the liver. Her Blood Purifier works wonders in its special line and bids fair to equal the Compound in its popularity.

All must respect her as an Angel of Mercy whose sole ambition is to do good to others.

MY FIRST WIFE.

BY G. MANVILLE FENN.

From the Whitehall Review.

"Ah, my darling little sis, how are you? "Lesbia hath a beaming eye."

"My dear Frank! I am glad to see you."

There was an embrace, and the lady burst into tears.

"Lesbia has not a beaming eye!" cried Frank Resdon, barrister, who had just leaped down from the dog-cart after a cold drive from the station at Ramford to his brother-in-law's handsome place, the Coppices, Calkston, where that new relative had settled after his return from Australia, where he had been sent—the younger son of a good old family—to see what he could do as what is euphoniously termed a squatter. He had squatted to some advantage, the fates having been kind; and, after making a moderate fortune, he had suddenly doubled it by marrying the widow of a colonial magnate.

At the lady's desire—her will being paramount—they were on their way to England, when one night they were awakened by an awful crash, and, rushing on deck they found all in confusion. Some vessel had run into them during a fog, cut the great Austral liner down below the water's edge, and during the next half hour there was a fight for life.

John Audas behaved admirably. When the rush was made for the boats, he knocked down half a dozen cowards one after the other, and by sheer strength helped the captain to send off the first boat properly manned, with half the women passengers, merely stipulating that his shrieking, elderly wife should be one. Then he helped with the next, and got that off safely, before being overpowered, for a mad rush ensued, the other boats were filled anyhow, and at last the captain, second mate, half a dozen men and the brave young passengers were left alone upon the deck of the sinking ship, with just time enough to lash a few spars together, throw them overboard, and trust themselves to this frail support before the vessel went down.

From this raft they were picked up exhausted, half dead, by a passing ship, having seen no more of the boats, all of which were lost, presumably, in the gale which came on before many hours had passed; and thus it was that John Audas found himself a widower, at 35, and far from inconsolable, for report said his existence with the relict of the colonial magnate had been of the kind to which some people give a very unpleasant term.

So little indeed was the handsome young colonist affected by his loss that, after settling down at the Coppices, where he reveled in the life of a country gentleman, a year had hardly passed before he was a suitor for the hand of Lesbie Reston, the daughter of the old vicar of Calkston, and the belle of the country ball.

Matters followed one another in the most prosaic way. John Audas was beyond reproach for a son-in-law; his wooing was downright and honest; and the lady found the bluff, sun-browned, well-informed fellow—albeit he was far from clever—quite a contrast and relief after the insipid "locals" of the neighborhood; so the result was that, after a short intimacy, John Audas proposed, was accepted. Frank Reston came from the Temple to be present at his sister's wedding, and now that, six months later, he had run down to spend a few days at the Coppices, to have a little shooting. he found her thin, pale, careworn and ready at a word to burst into tears.

"Why, little Lesby," he cried with all his old petting ways, "what is it? Surely Jack is not behaving badly to you?"

"No. Oh, no. It is nothing, Frank; I am a little hysterical."

"But it is something!" he exclaimed. "I'll have it out with John."

"My dear Frank, you'll make me wretched if you say a word."

"Oh, well, if you take that tone, of course I will not," said her brother; "but I came down here for a rest and to have a bit of enjoyment, and find you in tears."

"Yes, yes; and it's all my nonsense, Frank dear. There, it's all gone now. It's the weather, I think."

"Where's John?"

"Either in the stables, or down the garden, dear. I'll send for him."

"Oh, I'll go and look him up. I suppose he'll be glad to see me?"

"Why, of course, dear. He has been talking about nothing else since he heard you were coming, and making no end of plans."

"Ah, that's right," said Frank Reston, smiling.

"And I'm so glad you've come, Frank, dear. You see, I'm afraid I'm not much of company for dear John—not such company as—as I think his first wife was."

"Well, you're a deal better company than she is now."

"I'll try very hard to take an interest in his pursuits; but I'm so stupid, Frank, that I'm afraid he gets out of patience."

"I'll tell you what it is, Lesby," said Frank Reston, bluntly; "if you two people can't be happy in this glorious place, with every luxury about you and only to speak to have whatever you please, you deserve—you deserve—there I don't know what you don't deserve!"

"Yes, dear, we do," said the lady meekly. "Ah, here comes dear John. I'll run away; don't tell him I've been crying."

"Stuff! Is it likely?"

"And, pray, pray Frank, don't let him think that I have been murmuring. It would make me so unhappy."

As she spoke she ran off, and Frank Reston crossed the hall to meet his stalwart brother-in-law, who looked the beau ideal of a country gentleman, and a striking contrast to the pale, careworn student, fresh from his gloomy chambers in town.

"Ah, Frank, my dear boy, I am glad to see you. Why, you pale, bleached bookworm—here, come out in the open air and let's get some color in your cheeks. Come and have a look at the dogs."

They went and had a look at the splendid setters and retrievers in their kennels, and as Reston admired them—

"Ah," said Audas, "if my first wife had been alive, how she would have idolized those dogs."

"Better have idolized you," said Reston bluntly.

"Yes, of course," said Audas, in nowise appeased. "We'll have a grand ride or two while you are here. Come over to the stables I've got a mare that will suit you to a T. There," he said, as he patted first one and then another satined-shinned beauty, as it turned its head round with a rattle of the headstall for the expected bit of sweet carrot or cake, "they're right, arn't they? Ah, if my first wife had been alive, she would have enjoyed a few gallops over some of the wolds."

"Humph! would she?" said Reston.

"Yes; she was a splendid woman on horse back. Well, come in now and dress, and let's go to dinner."

"Well, I shan't be sorry to have it" said the London guest; and with his brother-in-law's hand affectionately resting upon his shoulder, they went in, and in due time dined.

But somehow that was not so pleasant a meal as it might have been, and the acute barrister was not long in finding that the grit that showed itself in the cooking, the acidity in the wine, and the jar in the conversation was all due to one thing, which found voice in the words: "Ah, if my first wife," etc.

"Jack loves her," said Frank Reston to himself, as he lay in bed that night, "she worships him, and they are not happy. Jack Audas is a good fellow, but not over wise. Lesby is the most amiable little darling that ever breathed, and yet they don't seem as they should be. Hang his first wife! Humph! well, no; she's deceased. What a fool the man is to poison his cup of happiness like this! By Jove, what a good thing it would be if Lesby had a dangerous fit of sickness; it would bring Jack to his senses, and—heigh, ha, ha, hum, how sleepy I am—and——"

That was all, for he dropped off to sleep at once. But he had similar thoughts to these every night during his stay, and again on his way back to London, after doubling the length of his visit, and even then his brother-in-law being half offended because he would not, as Audas said, "make it a few days longer."

"If my first wife had been alive! If my first wife had been alive!" the very beat of the train seemed to pour those words in Frank Reston's ears as he sped south, and thought over the matrimonial situation at the Coppices.

"Poor little Lesby! He'll break her heart," he said to himself. "I do not wonder at it. She feels jealously miserable about that first wife. I wish now I had spoken to Jack."

"No, I don't," he said after a little more thinking, "It would not have been wise."

"Perhaps something may happen to bring him to his senses," he said, after another pause; "something always does happen."

And then he read the Times till he reached town.

* * * * *

Frank Reston sat in his dingy room hard at work over a brief—not his first; but these documents were sufficiently rare visitants to make him study those which came with the most intense application.

Probably from a desire that the deep truths that he gleaned from the carefully written folios before him should not escape after being once taken into his head, the young barrister was resting his brow upon his hands, his elbows were upon the table, and his thumbs over his ears, while, as from time to time he read a few words out aloud, it seemed in the semi-obscurity of the gloomy room as if he were addressing himself to a venerable gentleman on the other side of the room, till a more penetrating look showed that the said venerable gentleman was only the young barrister's wig-block with the time-honored grizzled head-gear, which betokened the regular wearer's position in a court.

"Gentleman to see you, sir," said his clerk, entering the room.

"Name?" said Frank, laconically.

"Wouldn't give no name sir. Must see you directly, sir."

"Hullo!" exclaimed the barrister, as a well-muffled-up traveler, forced his way in, bag and rug in hand.

"Hush! only me; send away your clerk."

"Why, my dear John, what is the matter? Lesby?"

"Oh, she's all right; God bless her!" cried Audas, throwing himself into a chair, and gazing wildly, with blank, cadaverous face, at his brother-in-law. "Give me something for heaven's sake—brandy—wine—I'm done up."

Reston opened a cupboard, brought out his spirit stand, and Audas hastily gulped down a glass of spirit, returning the glass to the table with trembling hand.

"Why, John, old fellow," said Reston, "what is it?"

"I'll—I'll tell you directly. I hardly dare; but, oh, Frank, I swear to you I did it all in innocency. Oh, my darling! My poor darling! Don't blame me, Frank. I swear to you I believed it all."

"Here, here! Come, come, old fellow. Don't give way like this. Why, hang it, man, what is it? You look as if you had committed a crime"

"I have, Frank, I have; and against the dearest, the sweetest girl that ever blessed a man with her tender love."

"Why, John Audas," said Reston, fiercely, "if you have dared to raise your hand against my sister—"

"Raised my hand against her?" cried Audas, in tones of withering contempt, "Why, I would sooner hew it off."

"Then what the deuce is the meaning of all this? You haven't been such a fool as to take shares in a gold mine?"

"Bah! Don't be absurd."

"What is it, then? Crime? What do you mean?"

"Read that," cried Audas, tearing his pocket-book from his brest with trembling hands, opening it and producing one of those dirty, discolored pieces of paper which a paternal government considers good enough for the transmission of a telegram.

"Eh! Why, what's this?" said Reston, reading, "From Grace Audas, Ultramarine Hotel, Folkestone, Calkshire. Come to me at once. Our boat drifted to an island. Very ill."

John Audas wiped the great drops of perspiration from his forehead.

"Well, but—" began Reston in puzzled tones.

"I believed she was dead, Frank. On my soul I believed she was."

"And on the strength of that, sir, you have won a sweet young girls affection, and committed bigamy."

"Yes, yes," groaned Audas. "And I was so happy."

"You scoundrel!" cried Reston fiercely.

"Don't, for God's sake, don't turn upon me like that, Frank."

"There is one comfort," continued the young barrister, "the law can be pretty hard upon a villain who blights a young girl's life in such a way as this; and the punishment!"—

"Curse the punishment" roared Audas. "What do I care for the punishment?" I'd go through fourteen years' penal servitude with pleasure, if it would spare my poor darling pain."

"Then she doesn't know it yet?"

"Know it? Of course not. I could not tell her," groaned Audas.

"And pray what do you intend to do? Of course, the only thing is for you to make my sister a very large settlement. But I shall insist upon that. I'll go and fetch her away at once."

"What! and separate us, Frank? No, no; for heaven's sake, don't think of that! As for money, all I have is hers—bless her; but we must not part. Frank, I swear to you that if you take her away I'll blow my brains out at the hotel."

"Humph! I wouldn't do that," said Resdon, coolly. "But perhaps you have some plans."

"Plans? Yes," cried the other, excitedly; "I brought her up with me. She's at the Grand."

"What, here in London?"

"Of course. I am going to take her to Paris."

"Via Folkstone?"

"Curse, no! via Dover. I shall take an assumed name. We'll travel for a few years until that fiend of a woman really dies. Frank, she was a perfect curse to me. My life was one long torment, and here, now that my life has been one long bliss, like a spoiled fool I have been hipped and gloomy; and, Frank—would you believe it?—I was such a brute, such a scoundrel to poor Lesby, that I found fault with the dinner, and I said—I wish my tongue had been cut out."

"What did you say that for?"

"No, no; I did not say that. I said if my first wife had been alive we would have had a better dinner."

"I should hardly believed it of you, John Audas."

"No, you would not, Frank; but I'm such a fool at times. You see I'm not like you, all brains. I'd give anything to be as clever and—and"

"As ugly!"

"No, old fellow; I was going to say wise as you are. Ah! Frank, that woman was nearly 50 when I married her, and she only had me out of spite, I believe, so as to annoy some one else. I never had a moment's peace with her, I was a bigger fool when I married her than I am now. I say, you won't think of my being separated from Lesby?"

"But your wife? She has the best right to you—of course the right."

"I don't care," said the big fellow, setting his teeth and growing stern and dogged now. "I'd about lost my head. That telegram was a regular crusher. But I'm coming round now, and I should like to see the man who'd step between me and my wife."

"But she is not your wife, sir," cried Reston, sternly.

"And I say she is," cried Audas, rising with his fists clenched and a fierce, menacing look in his eyes. "I say she is my dear wife, and no law shall come between us or separate us. Oh, Frank, I do love her dearly, and I never knew how much till I received this awful news."

"Humph!" said Reston, drily; "some men don't find it out till their wives are dead. Here, let's see that message again. We must look at this matter in a cool, business-like way."

"Of course. You can. I couldn't; it nearly drove me mad."

"Um—um—um," buzzed the young barrister, reading the telegram. "Bigamy is an awkward offense against the law. Um—um—um. Let's see, you received them telegram this morning?"

"Yes, and packed up and came off at once. Lesby thinks its important business regarding money affairs."

"Humph!" said Reston, holding the telegram first on one side then on the other, and then between himself and the light, as if expecting to obtain brain illumination that way, while John Audus watched his movements with speechless anxiety.

"Look here, Jack," Reston said at last, "it's one of the principles in law to believe nothing until it can be proved."

"Yes, of course, said Audas.

"Well, look here, then, old fellow, how do you know that this telegram is true?"

"Oh, its genuine enough."

"How do you know?"

"How do I—eh? What! how do I know!"

"Yes; I will repeat my question a dozen times if you like, my good sir," said Reston, involuntarily dropping into the cross-examining style, "how do you know that this telegram is true? It may a hoax."

"What?" roared Audas.

"I say it may be a hoax."

John Audas got up, drew a long breath, clenched his fist and began walking up and down the room.

"I say it may be a trick," said Reston again.

"If it is, and I get hold of him who did it, I'll treat him like I would a nut," growled the great fellow.

"Humph! I wouldn't do that," said Reston, quietly watching him. "Manslaughter's worse than bigamy."

"Here, I say," panted Audas, imploringly, "don't say that last word again; I can't bear it."

"Besides, it might have been done by a jealous woman. It's rather a feminine-looking trick."

"Couldn't be, Frank, old fellow, for I never take notice of women. I'm all for horses and dogs. I've neglected poor Lesby for them."

"Hah!" said Reston. "Well, you want my advice, eh?"

"Yes, old fellow, if you will help me, Look here: go down to Folkestone and see what you can do with her. Promise anything only tell her she can't have me again. I'll blow out my brains first."

"Don't be a fool, Jack. You'd like me to see her, then, eh?"

"Yes, yes; do, Frank, for Lesby's sake as well as mine."

Frank Reston rose and touched the bell. "Here, go and get a sixpenny Bradshaw," he said to the man who appeared.

"I know what time the trains are,' said John Audas, excitedly.

"You leave matters to me," said the brother-in-law abruptly; and the country squire sank back in his chair.

"Thanks; that will do," said Reston, taking the little fat, square book from the clerk and turning over its pages. "Ah, here it is—Ultramarine Hotel, Folkestone, James Thompson. Now we'll see."

He took a telegraph form and wrote a message: "From F. Reston, Emperor's Chambers, Temple, London, to J Thompson, Ultamarine Hotel, Folkestone. Is Mrs. Grace Audas or Mrs. John Audas staying at your hotel? Answer paid. Wire."

"Now we shall have taken our first step," said Reston, ringing. "Send that telegram directly."

"How long shall we be getting an answer?" said Audas gloomily.

"Depends on the amount of business. Perhaps in an hour. Perhaps in three. There, take the paper, I must go on with my brief."

"That you shan't," cried his brother-in-law, snatching away the papers. "You must talk to me. This is a consultation. I'll pay."

Reston saw that it was of no use to combat his brother-in-law, so to make the time pass more easily he lit a cigar, and sat and listened to the great earnest fellow's long-winded details of how badly he had behaved to his "little darling," as he called her. "But she must never know of this, Frank," he kept saying.

"Not if we can keep it from her," said the barrister quietly; and he sat back in the easy chair, looking grimly amused, and thinking that, after all, his sister might have done worse than marry the big honest Englishman, whose good looks and manly ways had won her heart.

But it was a tedious time, and it took all the young barrister's skill in tempting his brother-in-law into fresh narratives, to keep him from rushing back to his hotel, and taking flight to avoid the police who would soon be on his track.

At last, though the telegram arrived, and there was a curiously puckered appearance about Frank Reston's eyes as he opened it and held it, gazing at it for a few moments without speaking.

"Why don't you put me out of my misery?" cried Audas at last, and, snatching the telegram, he read the word "No."

"What! Why; what does this mean?"

"I asked if Mrs. Audas was at the Ultramarine hotel," said Reston, slowly, "and the answer comes back, "No." My dear boy, it's a hoax."

"Hah!" ejaculated John Audas, drawing in and expressing a long breath, and then striding toward the door.

"What are you going to do?"

"First find out who did that."

"Nonsense, man! Some fool who thought you were not happy with your wife to try you—"

"It was that Miss—"

"Never mind who it was, man. Go back to Lesby, and take her for a run on the continent. It will do you both good."

"By jove, I will!" cried Audas. "I say, come and dine with us, and see us off afterward."

"Oh be sure I will," said Frank Reston; and he did, spending a pleasant evening with his brother-in law and sister, whose pallor seemed to wear off as she saw her husband's high spirits and heard his plans.

* * * * * * *

"Not a bad bit of work," said Frank Reston, as he watched the train steam out of the Viaduct station, for John Audas would not go by Folkestone. "Do him good. Bring him to his senses. Deuced unprofessional trick, though. Ha-ha-ha!" he laughed, as he lit a cigar. "If my first wife had been alive!" I wonder what Jack would say if he knew who sent him that telegram."

Things in General.

Mr. J. B. Germain, of West Troy, N. Y., has given $50,000 to Williams college for the establishment of a chair of theology, and that the venerable John Z. Goodrich, of Stockbridge, Mass., has added to his previous benefactions the gift of a cranberry patch in New Jersey that promises to be worth $25,000.

The new Carthusian monastery in Sussex, England, which has just been consecrated, is the largest establishment of the kind in existence, covering nine and a half acres of ground and measuring half a mile in circumference. It is the only Carthusian monastery in England, and was built to provide accommodation for the brothers turned out of France.

The loungers around the depot at El Paso, Tex., were surprised to see a live cow lying complacently on the pilot of the locomotive which brought the express in. The animal had been caught up ten miles back, and, instead of being thrown off, she was lodged on the pilot between the stays, where she stayed. When helped off she showed no signs of injury, but started out in search of pasture.

Another piece of the true cross has come to light, this time in Poitiers, France. It was sent to a noted saint some time in the sixth century by the Emperor's Justin from Constantinople. It is known to be genuine, because a copy of the Emperor's letter to the saint is said to be somewhere in existence, besides which it is said to have been the means of miraculous cures at various times. It is, however, a totally different variety of wood from any of the other piecers of the true cross, which is in itself a mysterious circumstance.

The largest prison in Europe is the house of detention at Berlin, which has just been completed. It comprises six separate buildings, to which have been transferred all prisoners awaiting trial in the city. The main building for men contains 732 separate cells, besides dormitories for 194 prisoners, rooms for turnkeys and sleeping accommodations for 118 attendants. The interior is constructed of iron and so arranged that all the corridors look out upon the central hall, which commands a view of the entrance to every cell. The prison for women contains 70 cells and fifteen large dormitories divided into sections, each containing a bed which can be locked up when its occupant has "turned in."

Dr. Brown-Sequard was about to vivisect a young monkey before the fashionable company in Paris, when the agonized howls and moans of the poor beast disturbed the spectators, and the doctor coolly prepared to sever the animals vocal chords with his desecting knife to silence its protests against his cruelty. But a young woman in the lecture room charged upon the professor with her umbrella, and punched his head with considerable effect. The police were called in, and the champion of mercy was removed. Her energetic protest did her honor. Vivisection in the investigation of physiological problems may be justified, but the torture of a poor beast to gratify curiosity, or for the illustration of a lecture is simply infernal.

Sir John Lubbock in the Nineteenth Century makes a statement which is hard to realize. Down to the year 1824 the English government gave to the taxpayer a notched stick as a receipt. The old exchequer tallies were willow rods about five feet long, which were notched at certain intervals, each notch being understood to mean so many pounds, shillings and pence, or fractions thereof. When the amounts were thus notched, the stick was split, one part being kept by the tax payer and the other by the government. Immense numbers of these old tallies were stowed away in the vaults of the old house of commons, and it is said that they were probably the cause of the fire which destroyed it.

It is known to be genuine, because a copy of the emperor's letter to the saint is said to be somewhere in existence, besides which it is said to have been the means of miraculous cures at various times. Keeping Warm in the Far North.

I reached home on the 13th, the coldest weather I experienced on the trip being on the 13th, when, about two hours before sunrise, the thermometer indicated 53 degrees Fahrenheit. That day I made a journey of twenty-five miles, riding most of the way on the sledge, and at no time during that day did I feel uncomfortable, the highest thermometer reached being 50 degrees Fahrenheit, and I might here say that I really enjoyed the whole trip. I attribute this almost wholly to the Esquimaux reindeer clothing and constant living in a snow igloo like the natives, where the temperature is never above freezing, and generally 10 to 15 degrees below that point. I do not believe—and my belief is confirmed by the written accounts of others—that any Arctic voyage, housed in warm ships as their base and clad in the usual Arctic suits of explorers, could stand such a journey without more or less material discomfort. Once only did I learn the lesson of comfort. I took off my right mitten in attempting to get a shot at a passing reindeer, the wind blowing stiffly in my face, and the thermometer 37 degrees Fahrenheit, when the persistent refusal of the frozen gunlock to work perfectly kept my hand exposed much longer than I had intended. When I attempted to use it again it seemed paralyzed, and, looking at it, I noticed that the skin was as white as marble. Tooloosh, who was beside me, noticed it at the same time, and with an Innuit exclamation of surprise, hastily doffing both his mittens, grasped it between his warm hands, and then held it against his warm body under his coo-letah, or Esquimaux coat. It soon resumed its functions, and although I felt for some time as though I was holding on to a hornet's nest, I experienced no more serious results than a couple of ugly-looking blisters where the iron of the gun had come in contact with the bare hand. The reindeer escaped. As the reindeer clothing is the warmest in the Arctic, so it makes the warmest bedding, two large skins made into a coffin-like bag, or sack, the hair side in, being a sufficient protection in the coldest weather when in a properly constructed igloo. When the first severe cold came at North Hudson bay I was sleeping under a blanket and two fine buffalo robes, which I found, as the thermometer sank below 30 to 40 degrees Fahrenheit, to be inadequate to secure comfort, until I procured a reindeer sleeping-bag, weighing not half as much, after which cold nights were no longer dreaded. The robe of the American bison seems under the least provocation to become damp, and then freezes as stiff as a piece of sole leather. Once spoiled in this manner, it is difficult to dry it and restore it to its former pliability in the low temperature of an igloo. The furs of the beaver and muskrat I found to be equally unsuitable in our mode of life, and I believe that all the other furs of the temperate zone would have shared the same opinion if tested in the same practical way.—Lieut. Schwatka, in Forest and Stream.

A fac-simile copy of the London Times for October 3, 1798, is in the possesion of President Tuttle of Wabash college. It consists of four pages, being 24 inches by 17 in size. One of the news items states as a great achievement the fact that Mrs. Siddons performed at Brighton, Bath and London, within the incredible short space of 96 hours. "I'll bet you $10 you don't know what it means, though," said Mackin. "I'll just go you," said Crawford, eagerly; "everybody knows what it means "My God, my God, why hast thou forsaken me?" "Here's your ten-er," said Mackin. admiringly, handing it over; "I had no idea that you were such a Latin scholar."

An interesting fact about Russia is that many of its coldest provinces fruit-growing is an important branch of industry. In the province of Kazan, which is 350 miles farther than Winnipeg, and where the mercury in winter sometimes falls as low as sixty degrees below zero, apples are grown in large quantities at a profit. In the province of Vladimir, which is almost as cold as Kazan, cherries of excellent quality are raised in great abundance. Both apples and cherries are shipped from these provinces in large quantities. In these high latitudes, fruit trees are usually small, being not over eight feet in height, and are planted in clumps like stalks of corn. Their low branching limbs are usually loaded with the most luscious fruit.

The average weight of 20,000 men and women weighed at Boston in 1864 was: Men, 141 1-2 pounds; women, 124 1-2 pounds. At the recent Cincinnati Industrial Exposition the Department of Scientific and Educational Appliances detailed a clerk to record the weights of western men and women. The number weighed was 22,115, and the total weight was 3,072,306 pounds. The men weighed numbered 7,467, weighing 1,150,103 pounds. The women weighed numbered 14,663, weighing 1,922,193 pounds. The average weight of each man was 154.02. The average weight of each woman was 139.87. The average weight of 141 men from Ohio was 157.33: the average weight of 177 women was 133.26. The average weight of 124 men from Southern Indiana and Illinois was 159.52 pounds; the average weight of 193 women was 133.55. The average weight of 114 men from Kentucky was 158.32 pounds; the average weight of 188 women was 133.76.

Ann Hathaway's Second Husband.

Mr. Moncure D. Conway, writing from Stratford-on-Avon to the Cincinnati Commercial Gazette, says:

"The story of the poet's death by fever, after drinking, looks like a Puritan invention to stigmatize a play-actor. On the other hand, neither Haliwell nor any other Shakespearian writer makes mention of the following very remarkable fact: In the old register of burials kept in the church, where I have just inspected it, there is the following double entry:

Aug., 8, Mrs. Shakespeare, Anna uxor Richardi James.

There could hardly be plainer evidence that the widow of Shakespeare had married one Richard James after the poet's death. The Mrs. Shakespeare is inserted for identification. But who was this Richard James? Whoever he was, there would have fallen to him all the letters and papers of the poet, which have so mysteriously disappeared, insomuch that not one smallest scrap of the poet's handwriting (signatures excepted) has ever been discovered. The antiquarians of England ought to institute a grand hunt for traces of Ann Hathaway's second husband. Nor should they rest until they have explored Shakspeare's tomb. That this should be prevented by the doggerel engraved upon it is unworthy of a scientificage. I have heard it suggested that if any documents were buried with Shakspeare they should, by this time have been destroyed by the moisture of the earth, but the grave is considerably above the level of the Avon, as I observed to-day, and even any traces connected with the form of the poet would be useful. His skull, if still not turned to dust, should be reserved in the Royal College of Surgeons, as the apex of the climbing series of skeletons, from the microscope to the divine."

THE POCASSETT TRAGEDY.

Some of the Results of Freeman's Crimes.

A correspondent of the Boston Journal, who has been visiting the scene of Freeman's sacrifice of his child, writes:

"For some time after the burial of the child some of Freeman's followers sought to comfort themselves and to answer their neighbors by asserting that they had simply miscalculated the time appointed for the resurrection. A few claimed that three days had been mistaken for as many years. But now probably all in their hearts are convinced of their great error. Some are still too proud to acknowledge their delusion, but probably none would again walk under Freeman's leadership. A fair idea of the position in which a portion have taken refuge is gained from a conversation yesterday with a man who was one of Freeman's most ardent supporters. Willing enough to dwell upon his new doctrine, he said: 'Four years ago I should have been puzzled to tell when Freeman's insanity began. But now can name the day and the hour—it was when he was converted. And any one who claims to believe in this nonsense of miracles—this turning water into wine, walking on the water, raising dead folks, and such stuff—is just as crazy as Freeman was. You talk about God's being the same yesterday, to-day, and forever, and then brand a man as insane if he attempts to test the faith which the Bible says shall remove mountains! I tell you the Gospel they say began with Abraham came pretty near ending with Freeman. Suppose one of these revivalists should try to convert Charles Freeman now! He would say he had tried your faith and knew just what it was worth. You newspaper men had the grandest opportunity of the age to use that case to break down delusion and error; but you catered to popular religious prejudices.' The same man was anxious that Freeman should have a thorough trial, with special inquiry into the causes of the insanity, in order that the world might learn 'what religion was good for in practice instead of in theory."

Others are not so bitter in their scepticism. They do not denounce religion and the Bible, but if drawn into the subject, simply state their inbelief in any established doctrine. One or two have drifted into spiritualism, and they claim to have visions and manifestations from friends who have gone. Only one has resumed worship in the Methodist Church, from which all were expelled during the religious excitement of which the tragedy was the culmination. Probably none of the old company would desire to see Freeman return to Pocasset.

"While much of the old bitterness among the village folk naturally remains the feeling of intolerance toward Adventists has for most part disappeared. Spite of all that has been said in the past, the people are God-fearing, hard-working, and intelligent. The natural piety crops out even in the district school, where a youthful student of history the other day solemnly affirmed that God discovered America. There would be an emphatic protest against Freeman's release and return. Indeed, it would not be surprising if a coat of tar and feathers that has been suggested should be applied in that event. Few believe that he would not drift back into his old delusion or like it. The pastor of the Methodist Church Rev. Samuel D. Fox, who has been located here two years, has aimed to encourage the return of any who should be willing to confess their error. It has, however. seemed wisest not to provoke discussion by direct solicitation. Advent meetings are no longer held, and though a few of the clan gather in groups from house to house on the Sabbath, there is no pretence of holding public worship.

'The village has grown during the four years. People are fast finding out that it is one of the loveliest little hamlets on this picturesque coast. The permanent residents are thrifty and well-to-do, gaining a comfortable livelihood on land and sea. Summer tourists are beginning to appreciate its facilities for for enjoyment with hook, line, and gun. Just now there is excellent sport among the shore birds along the beaches. May flowers are at their best, the bluefish season is opening, and the woods are well stocked with deer which you cannot shoot. The Freeman House is unchanged save the absence of everything movable that relic hunters could carry away. They had begun to steal even the shingles from the roof when the family now occupying the building moved in. There is a constant stream of visitors during warm weather, many having made pilgrimages from long distances. It is stated by relatives of Freeman now living near the village that in the event of his release he will settle with his family in the West."

The Year Without a Summer.

During a cold spring, like that which is just now drawing to an end, people generally console themselves with the reflection that the sun will eventually get the victory, and that summer will will certainly come at last, though its coming may be delayed. Uncertain as the weather is, the general features of the seasons recur with a regularity which warrants the confidence thus reposed in the annual return of seed time and harvest; but there are instances on record in which even the seasons seem to have lost their characteristic features, as if the ordinary laws of meteorology had been temporarily suspended. A remarkable case of this kind, and which the long-continued cold weather of this spring makes particularly interesting just now, is that of the year 1816, which has been called "the year without a summer." A communication printed in the Congregationalist, of Boston, gives the following summary of the weather of this remarkable year:

January and February were mild: March was cold; April began warm, but ended in snow and ice. Ice formed an inch thick in May, and fields were planted over and over again till it was too late to replant. June was the coldest ever known in this latitude; frost and ice were common. Almost every green thing was killed; fruit nearly all destroyed. Snow fell to the depth of ten inches in Vermont, seven in Maine, three in the interior of New York, and also in Massachusetts. There were a few warm days. It was called a dry season. But little rain fell. The wind blew steadily from the north, cold and fierce. Mothers knit extra socks and mittens for their children in the spring, and woodpiles that usually disappeared during the warm spell in front of the houses were speedily built up again. Planting and shivering were done together, and the farmers who worked out their taxes on the country roads wore overcoats and mittens. In a town in Vermont a flock of sheep belonging to a farmer had been sent as usual to their pasture. On the 17th of June a heavy snow fell in New England. The cold was intense.

A farmer who had a large field of corn in Tewksbury built fires around it at night to ward off the frost; many an evening he and his neighbors took turns watching them. He was rewarded with the only crop of corn in the neighborhood. Considerable damage was done in New Orleans in consequence of the rapid rise of the Mississippi river. Fears were entertained that the sun was cooling off, and throughout New England all picnics were strictly prohibited.

July was accompanied with snow and ice. Indian corn was nearly all destroyed; some favorably situated fields escaped. August was more cheerless, if possible, than the summer months which preceeded it. Ice was formed half an inch in thickness. Indian corn was so frozen that the greater part was cut down and dried for fodder. Almost every green thing was destroyed in this country and in Europe. On the 30th snow fell at Barnet, forty miles from London. Very little corn ripened in New England and the Middle States. Farmers supplied themselves from corn produced in 1815 for seed in the spring of 1817. It sold at from $4 to $5 per bushel.

September furnished about two weeks of the pleasantest weather of the season, but in the latter part of the month ice formed an inch thick. October had more than its share of cold weather. November was cold and snowy. December was comfortable, and the winter following was mild. Very little vegetation was matured in the Eastern and Middle States. The sun's rays seemed to be destitute of heat during the summer; all nature was clad in a sable hue; and men exhibited no little anxiety concerning the future of this life.

The average price of flour during the year in the New York market was $13 per barrel. The average price of wheat in England was ninety-seven shillings per quarter. Bread riots occurred throughout Great Britain in 1817, in consequence of the high price of the staff of life.—[Boston Congregationalist.

Miscellaneous Matters.

California steps forward with the champion mule story. At Pescadero the other night a jack that was in a corral kicked a grizzly bear to death, that had come in from the mountains to make a meal on the stock. A reward of $50 had been offered for the killing of the bear, and the owner of the jack has sued the offerer of the reward for the um mentioned. It is a mean man that would hesitate to pay $50 in such a case.

During the year 1882 there were 1,869 scholars taught in Dougherty county, Ga. Of these 1,676 were colored, and only 193 were white. Twenty-seven colored and seven white teachers were employed. There are about seven colored men to one white in Dougherty county, and evidently in this case at least the colored people cannot complain of any partiality in the distribution of the school fund.

Newstead Abbey has thrice changed hands since it became the property of Lord Byron. It was sold, with the estate, by the poet to Mr. Clawton for $700,000, and resold by the latter in 1818 to Col. Wildman for $475,000. The colonel left no issue and the estate was sold after his death to Captain Webb the present owner, who it is understood would entertain a reasonable offer of purchase. The place has been vastly improved since Byron's time, when it was in a miserable plight.

The electricity generated by the machinery in one of the great Harmony mills, at Cohoes, owing to peculiar conditions which are not perfectly understood, has of late so charged the atmosphere as to affect the employes unpleasantly. Various attempts were made without result to remove the nuisance, but at last a net-work of wires running through the mill has been successfuly employed to collect the electricity and conduct it to the ground.

It is still a custom in some of the back towns in New England to auction off the poor of the town annually. Each name is called, and the person who makes the lowest bid has the care and keeping of such person for the year. It has the sole recommendation of economy, but we hardly think the Commonwealth of Massachusetts will even for that reason adopt the auction system for the maintenance of its insane and invalid poor.—Boston Traveler.

The London Illustrated journals make merry over the Vanderbilt ball—rather the newspaper stories about it. Thus one says: "A well-known lady represented a cat. Her overskirt was made entirely of white cat's tails, sewed on a dark background. The bodice was formed of rows of white cat's heads, and the headdress was a stiffened white cat's skin, the head over the forehead of the wearer and the tail pedant behind. A blue ribbon, with "Puss" inscribed upon it, from which hung a bell, worn around the neck, completed the dress." The comment of the amused narrator is: "And these are the people who worthy Mr. Herbert Spencer thinks work so hard, and stand in need of more amusement."

A little book is circulating in England entitled "Illustrious Abstainers," among whom the author claims Sir Garnet Wolseley and Dr. Samuel Johnson, Lord Wolseley has written a letter to a teetotaler in which he says he takes a deep interest in temperance, etc., "but I am not a total abstainer, and have never claimed the character for myself, but whenever I have found it necessary to enforce on the troops under my command a total abstention from alcohol, I have invariably observed the practice." Those who forget the "Who's for poonch." of Dr. Johnson, cannot help knowing that he drank wine when no one was to be injured by it.

The oysters-growers on the coast of France have discovered that oyster shells which are thrown back into the sea produce thirty or forty-fold in two years. The theory is that the young oysters attach themselves to the old shells in preference to any other object on the bed of the sea.

Speculating on One's Life.

From Demorest's Monthly for June.

The Chicagoan is nothing if not a speculator. He bets not only on grain and stocks, but on his very life. There are over twenty individuals in the chief city of Illinois whose lives are insured for $100,000 and over. John V. Farwell of that city has written to his credit $223,000 when he dies. Two hundred others in Chicago are insured for $55,000 and over, and over 1,000 for $20,000 and upward. Among the prominent men of eastern cities who carry large amounts of insurance we will name Cyrus W. Field, of New York, who has $250,000; F. B. Roberts, New York, $200,000; Charles Pratt, Brooklyn, $200,000; Alexander Barrett, New York, $200,000; F. W. De Voe, New York, $245,000; Pierre Lorrillard, New York, $255,000; James Park, Jr., Pittsburg, $300,000; W. H. Langly, Gallipolis, O. $300,000; Charles M. Runk, Allentown, Pa., $200,000; Geo. K. Anderson, Titusville, Pa., $315,000.

Representative Cox of New York, has just bought a $30,000 house in Washington.

Dr. Vaughn, the Roman Catholic Archbishop of Sydney, and probably the most distinguished of Australian prelates, is now in this country on his way to Rome. He belongs to one of the oldest Catholic families in England, and is a brother of the Bishop of Salford.

When the last bitterness was past, she bore
  Her singing Cæsar to the Garden Hill,
Her fallen pitiful dead Emperor.
She lifted up the beggar's cloak he wore
  —The one thing living that he would not kill—
And on those lips of his that sang no more,
  That world-loathed head which she found lovely still,
  Her cold lips closed: in death she had her will.

Oh wreck of the lost human soul left free
  To gorge the beast thy mask of manhood screened!
    Because one living thing, albeit a slave,
    Shed those hot tears on thy dishonored grave,
Although thy curse be as the shoreless sea,
  Because she loved, thou art not wholly fiend.

MONSIEUR LE PESTEUR.

CHAPTER I.

Service was over. The last hymn had been sung with all the vigor of mountain lungs; the last wooden shoe had clattered down the paved aisle; the last voice had died away on the still pine-scented air, and then the minister lifted his sad young face off the worn cushion of the high, narrow pulpit and came slowly down the steps into the church.

Outside among the hills, the sunshine lay in belts from peak to peak, and the Sabbath stillness was unbroken save for the hum of bees or the far-off, slumberous twittering of birds; but the four whitewashed halls of the ugliest building in the whole canton held only straight-backed pine-wood pews, homely and inartistic, and square ill-fitting windows that dimmed the daylight without owning the power to exclude chill draughts or keen northeasters.

The minister sighed as he lifted his hat off the little deal table fronting the pulpit, and went slowly out into the sunshine. Perhaps the unloveliness of his surroundings forced itself with scarcely recognized intrusiveness on his notice; perhaps his thoughts, following his heart, had escaped his control, and were far away.

On the narrow path between the patches of scanty turf belonging to the still church-yard among the pines, the old sexton paced slowly, sunning himself in sabbatical solemnity.

"You are waiting to lock up, Carton?"

"Yes, sir."

"There was a very good congregation to-day."

"Very, sir."

"It is lovely weather even for August."

"Yes, indeed, sir."

Having uttered the familiar words of salutation which, week in, week out, scarcely varied, the minister passed on between the lowly graves that lay to either side of him, and approached the high road.

He was a man of seven or eight and twenty, or thereabouts, slight, dark, delicate-looking, with an indefinable something about him speaking of culture and scholarship—a something odd and out of place in the remote little parish on the upper ranges of the habitable Alps, where a score or two of peasants loved him and called him M. le Pasteur. Of course they did not understand him, but thorough comprehension is not an essential of reverence, and they understood enough to know that he was very wise and learned, and so far above them that he must be very close to heaven. They were a little afraid of him, of course, but that was only right and fitting—far more afraid of him than the children were, who took him flowers, and their best wood-carvings, and pieces of honey, when such things could be spared for presents by careful mothers at home.

Chased by the unusual warmth of that summer day, the mists had shrunk and shriveled into obscure corners of the valley. In the higher air a score of larks caroled joyously; from the neglected turf on the quiet graves the bright-eyed daisies raised their innocent faces smilingly.

Nature was fair there for once, and yet he shivered as he looked around him. Did not even the beauty speak of loss and isolation, and death?

"You have kept me here so long! I thought you were never coming."

"Did you wait for me?"

"Yes."

"How good of you! I never thought of that."

He had lifted his hat hurriedly, and was standing bare-headed before the girl who had addressed him.

"We shall part for good so soon, and you have avoided us so much of late that I must make occasions of seeing you."

"You are very kind."

"Kind to myself, yes. Do you think I am so little grateful as to owe you all I do without—loving you somewhat in return?"

Loving him! She had said the word quite simply, translating into her sweet hesitating French, yet he quivered as needlessly and stupidly as though he had misunderstood.

He muttered something in his throat, not looking at her, but at the ghostly mists in the valley.

"Do you know why I waited for you here?" she went on, looking at him with a mingled laughter and sorrow in her sweet blue English eyes, "Because it was here I met you first, and here it seems fitting somehow to talk with you last when I am so sorry. It is nearly a year since we came here, mother and I, and took possession of you, because we were strangers, and you were the only civilized inhabitant in our newly-discovered territory. And you were so kind—do you remember? I knew at once that I should like you, though I did not guess how dear everything here would grow."

He could not speak. He was leaning on the rustic gate, with his haggard face resting on his hand and his eyes averted.

"And you took us to the sweet old chateau—do you remember?—and told us you knew Madame la Baronne, and that she would let us have her house while she was in Italy. And do you remember how anxious mother was that you should be quite sure we were not adventuresses, and how she referred you to the Ambassador at Berne, and how you set all explanation aside with the perfect courtesy that is only learned in the schools of France?"

"I remember something of all this."

"But I am sure you don't remember all the pleasure you gave; how you used to read to us by the fire and play the organ to us in the old hall, and teach us to forget all the joy and pain of England."

"Don't!"

He raised his hand with a gesture, as though he would avert a blow. And the vague sadness in his face had expressed itself at last, and it was pain.

How cruel she was in her sweet kindness, how cruel to remind him of all he had gained, of all he was so soon to lose! Ah, those dear dead days in which she had been all the world to him, those long, bright evenings in the old, shadowy, fragrant rooms of the castle, amid the mellow lights of the wide hearth and the many-armed chandeliers; with the organ beneath his fingers interpreting all he felt, and the glow of the fire falling on her face and finding out the dimple in her cheek, the sweet curves of her neck, or the fragrant blossoms that rose and fell with every breath she drew! How cruel she was to recall it all, as he stood here in the chill sunshine, while shadowy hands beckoned her away from him!

"Is there anything the matter?"

"I am weary—that is all."

"So I thought to-day, and that is another reason why I wished to speak with you. You looked ill during service, and your sermon was strange—not glad as when I knew you first, but only resigned, as though you were trying to suffer and be strong. You are not unhappy?"

"Oh, no."

"Because, if you are, no one will be sorrier than I, no one having so much right. You have done so much for me," she went on, with a little quiver of the lips; "you have made the world seem tolerable after I had grown so weary of it. You have taught me strength for the acceptance of pain and the doing of duty. But for you I should never have had courage to go back to England."

He laughed harshly and mirthlessly.

"Then I have sent you away?"

"I think so."

"That is so like my fate."

"What do you mean?"

"When you go away my sun will have set; all my future will be spent in darkness then."

She shrank away from him, and the sweet roses in her cheeks paled a little.

"I did not mean to tell you," he went on. "The knowledge will pain you, and do me no good. But you have come to me in my weakest hour, and so I must speak. I love you, have loved you always since I knew you. It seemed to me once that heaven had sent you here, being satisfied with all I had tried to do, so I threw the reins on the back of my heart and let it go, but I question if I could have restrained it in any case. There, now, the murder is out. I think I shall die when you have left me."

"Oh, no, you will not, M. de la Roche; there is much of life left when love is over. But, all the same, I am very sorry that I have brought you pain like this."

Her lips quivered as she spoke, and two tears fell slowly down her face.

"Do not weep. Where there is no self-reproach there should be no sorrow. I never thought you would learn to love me. All that I did hope and believe was that you would be near me always, and that I might, unhindered, see your face at times."

"And I would stay if I could, for the thought of England is a load on my heart; but there are other girls at home, and my brothers, and it seems wrong that I should chain my mother here because I am a coward."

He did not say that there was a way out of her difficulty, that if she could stay for him she could stay with him; having no hope, he had no boldness.

"You believe I am sorry, don't you?" she said, looking up at him with wet eyes; "you believe that if I had dreamed of this I should have avoided you, as you have avoided me; and you will say you forgive me before we part, and you will come and see us at times till I leave; and you will write to me and let me know when you are happy again?"

"Oh, yes, if you wish."

"Then good-by for to-day."

"Good-by; forgive me if I let you go down to the chateau alone. I feel as if I could not be in your presence and refrain from pleading."

He held both her hands, looking down on her, and then he said huskily: "Will you kiss me? I never thought to kiss a woman till you came. Now—well, I think I have a right to that at least."

She raised her sweet face to his, trembling, and he kissed her, as we kiss the dead.

And then he turned and went slowly up the hillside alone.

CHAPTER II.

"Mother, I have something so odd, and strange, and sorrowful to tell you."

"What is it, dear?"

Mrs. Carrington lifted her eyes from the Tauchnitz novel she was reading, and looked at her daughter standing in the circle of the firelight on the hearth.

"It is something that makes me feel at once honored and ashamed, proud and sorrowful."

"Well, what is it?"

The girl came close to the chintz-covered couch on which her mother lay with a colored Afghan rug over her knees—for to Mrs. Carrington the mountain air was always chill—and stood there hesitating.

"Is it news from home?"

"Oh, no; it is only this: M. de la Roche loves me."

"Dear Connie, I am so glad."

"Why, mother?"

"Because he is a good man and a gentleman, and I am sure he will make you happy."

"Darling mother, you surely have not forgotten?"

"No; but I think it is quite time you had, Connie. I am ashamed to think that you should ever cast a backward thought on Frank Dalby, shamefully as he behaved. He is not worth remembering."

"Perhaps not; but still I cannot forget him," the girl answered, crying softly with her hands clasped about her knees, and her fair hair tumbled over her forehead.

Mrs. Carrington rose and came over beside her daughter, and drew the fair troubled face on to her breast. "You were always my favorite child," she said huskily, "the first and the dearest, and I have tried always to do for you the best that I knew. I have no interest in life that is not bound up in your happiness. I have been your slave and servant ever since your undeserved sorrow came. Do I not, therefore, merit a little thanks and consideration?"

"You do, and I am trying all I can to please you; is it not for your sake that I have consented to go back to Farnleigh?"

"Yes; but now I want something more of you."

"What is it?" There came the hunted look of a brave animal into the girl's blue eyes as she spoke.

"It is that you try to love M. le Pasteur. Oh, indeed, it will not be difficult, Connie, if you only try. He is so good, so true a gentleman, so grand a Christian; and then you would make him so happy."

"It would seem like sacrilege, and it would not be fair to him," the girl answered below her breath.

"Quite fair when he knows all." She rested her face against her mother's knee for an instant, and then she looked up, smiling sadly through her tears.

"Two years ago had I loved M. le Pasteur and desired to marry him, you would have thought me mad."

"Yes; because two years ago I was proud and foolish," but in her heart the mother was thinking: "Two years ago your life was unspoiled; now there are only fragments left for its rebuilding."

"Could it be right to marry him?"

That was the question the girl sat asking herself over and over as the wind rose and whistled among the pines. Once she would have thought it wicked to do so, but now, if it would make him happy, and if he chose her, knowing the truth——. That kiss which he had placed on her lips an hour before had convinced her that she cared for him, not with that proud, shy fondness of that long-ago love, but with a tenderness that perhaps was as worthy of him.

And then to be here always with him and the simple mountain-folk, while she faded from the minds of her English friends and was forgotten! That would be pleasant. She loved the blue valleys, the misty heights, the silvery music of the cow-bells, and the simple faces that smiled on her with mingled awe and admiration. Yes, she could be happy here, not in the old full-bodied, triumphant way, but far happier than by any other coming possibility.

She sat smiling at the firelight, and the tears had dried from off her face, and then she turned to her mother. "He will never ask me again; he took as final all I said to-day; if I mean to marry him I must ask him," she said.

So Mrs. Carrington knew that, half unconsciously, Connie had made up her mind.

The long evening passed, and he did not come, and the salon was dull without him, though Connie feigned not to miss him, and made vague imitations of his favorite music on the organ, and travestied his reading aloud by the fire. And in the morning he did not appear either, though the world donned her fairest aspect, and the edelweiss that he had given Connie a day or two before, to bring her good fortune, raised its petals afresh as though it had taken a new lease of life.

"He is breaking his promise of coming to me, the wicked man," she said to herself; "then I must go for him and bring him here, and make my recantation."

She put on her little hat, and tied a soft silk scarf round her slender throat; and then she looked at herself in the mirror with a little interest and pity.

Would they live at the chateau when they were married? she wondered, going slowly upward through the gloom that the pines held always in their embrace. Or would he take her to the little wooden parsonage house, with its balconied windows and veranda? For the first time in her life the thought that she was something of an heiress gave her pleasure. Her money would lend a little to make Henri de la Roche happy, and it was long since she had genuinely believed him the best man under the sun. He was as high above that other man as the stars; but she sighed a little as she admitted this, perhaps because she was too earthly to be entirely sympathetic with a star.

"Of course I must tell him everything," she thought, advancing slowly, with bent head. "I wonder will he mind very much—I wonder will he mind enough to refuse to have me then!"

The idea startled her so that she stood still a moment to think it over. It was quite possible that he might think what she had to tell so sad, not to say shameful, that he might cease to love her because of it. Well, that would not be her fault; she meant well, and she would tell the truth, and the end of it all was no longer within her power.

She was a little saddened, as though a meditated kindness had been already rejected, but that thought did not hinder her—indeed, nerved her rather to the effort that was before her. "If I tell him I shall try to love him, the choice will then be with him," she said, and went slowly forward till she heard the pebbles on the path above her crunch beneath descending feet, and saw a shadow fall athwart her passage.

"Monsieur, mon ami!" She extended both her hands to him, and stood before him rosy as the dawn, beautiful as embodied womanhood.

"Where were you going?"

"To look for you."

"I am here." He looked so worn and haggard that his aspect struck her with a new consciousness of pain.

"I came to meet you, because I have many things to tell and ask you," she said with a gravity that made him tremble.

"About what?"

"About you and me, and all you said yesterday."

"What did I say? Some folly, I suppose, to make you sorry?"

"Oh, no; something to make me feel very honored, something to compel a confidence of mine in return."

She sat down on a bowlder that jutted over the pathway as she spoke, and he dropped at her feet, with his face resting on his hands and his eyes averted.

If he would not look at her, would not speak to her, how could she say the strange thing she had come prepared with?

"I told you once that I had no heart. Do you remember?"

"Yes."

"And you did not ask the reason."

"No; friendships receives confidences, it never seeks them."

"Then you do not care to know anything about me?"

"Nothing but what you wish to tell."

Why did he not help her a little? why did he oblige her so remorsely to go on?

"Then I wish to tell you I was going to be married once."

"I thought as much."

"The man was—I don't know what he was, but he suited me, that is why he has been hard to forget. If he had been greater, perhaps I should have loved him less, for I am not great. But I did love him. I never could give such a love to another."

He shivered a little, lying at her feet, but he did not speak.

"We were to have been married. I was very happy. Everything had gone smoothly, every one was pleased. The wedding day came, and his brother, a pastor like you, was to marry us. I went to the church in all my bravery of bridal finery, with my bridesmaids and my friends, but he did not come to meet me. I never saw him from then till now."

Her voice had faltered, but it was the man's face that was quite white.

"And what did it mean?"

"I don't know; I never heard. He sent me a note that night by a messenger. He only said he was miserable, and begged me to forget him. When I knew that no accident had kept him away from me, that he was alive and well, I left home with my mother, that, among new scenes, I might learn to forget."

"And have you succeeded?"

"Yes, in a measure; so far that I can make a statement quite truthfully, and offer you something quite honestly."

"And what is that?"

She blushed, and her eyes fell.

"You have told me you love me."

"And it is true; God knows how true!"

"Then in that case, if it would make you happier to have me with you always as your wife, I shall stay."

He was sitting upright now, white as marble in the growing darkness.

"You would remain with me always as my wife, far from all the pleasant things that have made your world so fair? Do you mean that!"

"Yes."

"Then you must love me."

"Perhaps I do unknowingly; at least I am sure I shall love you one day."

He had roused her to a warmth of which she had deemed herself incapable. She had come to him conscious of her own generosity, and now she was actually eager that he should take her at her word.

His face had changed, it glowed so that it seemed quite beautiful.

"I am not worthy. Heaven is too good," he said, taking off his hat as though he were in a sanctuary.

She was awed. Did she merit a love like this?

"I shall try to make you happy—try with all my heart," she said, her lips quivering.

She did not understand him, she would never understand him as long as she lived. Instead of answering her he dropped on his knees beside her, and hid his face in her dress, sobbing.

CHAPTER III.

She would marry him. She had come to him of her own accord—heaven-sent, doubtless. And she loved him. He had not dared to believe that at first—only divine pity and tenderness could have inspired her—but, as the days passed, circumstances brought conviction, and the doubts and fears melted into rapture.

Unless she loved him could she have been so joyous in his presence, so tenderly concerned for him, so sweetly careful lest he should be sad or weary, so proud of him in his greatest hours, so sympathetic when he fell below them?

They were to go to England for a part of their honeymoon, that he might learn to know all her friends; and then they would return to the familiar but glorified life among the hills.

His happiness exhilarated him sometimes, at other times it oppressed him like a burden. What was he that so much good should befall him, while other men were dying for a gleam of sunshine, starving for a crumb of joy? He had loved humanity always because it suffered; he would love it better now since he had escaped from the common lot.

The world seemed transfigured, as he stood on the path, which wound from the valley up through the woods. Rays of light, like blades of silver, pierced the soft grayness of the rolling mists, and the drops of moisture gemming every leaf and twig, sparkled as though a shower of diamonds had fallen. How fair was nature; how good God was; how devoted to holy works would he make all his future, as a thank offering!

She loved him—would love him more. She had said so.

His mind was so full of her that her voice, breaking in on his reverie, did not startle him. He put aside the boughs hanging over the fallen tree on which he had seated himself, that he might see her as she came along toward him. Having done so, he could no more have dropped the verdant screen that would have hidden her from his gaze than if he had been turned to stone. She was not with her mother, as he had thought. A man accompanied her, a man whom he recognized at a glance, though he had never heard him described.

Statelier than a Celt, fairer than a Swiss, with bold blue eyes and blonde hair, and a military swing in his gait, and beauty that even the sullen, reproachful anger in his face could not mar—De la Roche knew that he was looking on Frank Dalby.

The girl's face was pale and tear-stained, her eyes were bent fixedly on the ground, her hands clasped before her in an attitude of resignation.

"You have not the slightest right to blame me" she was saying, "as little as you had to seek me out, that you may torture me now, when it is too late."

"And who made it too late?" he asked sadly. "Who ran away and hid herself, and made explanation and atonement impossible?"

"Did you not tell me to forget you?"

"I did, but it seemed the only way to do then."

"As it is the only thing to do now," she said quickly.

"Oh, no, for I am free."

"But I am bound."

"Only bound by your own word. I was bound by a fetter."

"And what a fetter!" she cried, her eyes flashing, and her chest rising and falling hurriedly; "a fetter that held you to a dancing woman, a woman whose name you dared not mention at home! And after such a marriage tie as that, you come to me with falsehoods about your love, and win my stupid heart, to break it, and disgrace me, you being married all the time."

"Did I know then that I was married? Is my oath not enough? Are the facts not proof enough that I had thought her dead? How could I know that she was too evil even to burn, when the theater she was dancing in was left a hell? How did I know that she would bide her time to come back and be avenged, with wicked cunning, when I might have been happy? And you reproach me that I had not told you about her. You think that, false in one thing, I must be false in all. Was it a fitting story to bring to a pure woman, the story of that old sorrow and shame? Was the grief of my youth likely to crown my manhood in your eyes? If I did wrong, have I not suffered enough? And as to her, had I been older and worse I should not have married her; in which case, in yours and all other eyes, I should have seemed blameless."

There was a hard, sneering emphasis in his tone which hurt the girl.

"Oh, no, Frank, don't think us worse Pharisees than we were, and forgive me if I have seemed to doubt you. You see your coming was such a sudden revival of the buried pain, that I hurt you more than I meant, perhaps, in self-defense. We have both suffered, and whichever of us erred has atoned, and now we may part friends."

"Then you mean us to part?"

"What can I do? There is no other way."

"Could you not tell this man the truth, and let him free you? I suppose he is honest enough to do that?"

"I shall never ask him." She was motionless now, her face bravely uplifted, though her tears fell fast. "He loves me far better than ever you loved me, Frank. I know that, though I am sure I don't know why he should."

"But you love me, and that is where I have the better of him."

There was an ugly frown on Capt. Dalby's brow. It is not every man who can play the last card of the game he has lost with grace.

"Perhaps I do; but that is my shame and sorrow, and it will not be always so, I trust, and know."

"And you will have nothing to say to me now?"

"No!"

"Then I need not detain you any longer. I am sorry I intruded upon you. Farewell."

"Farewell." She stood looking after him till he was out of sight, her head held high, her lips pressed together. Then she flung out her arms with a cry: "I do love him, I do love him! How can I bear it!"

A momentary oblivion seemed to fall on the minister; when it passed he was alone with his despair.

It was all over, the short, glorious dream in which he had believed himself beloved; the brief frenzy that had lifted him to the happiness of heaven. It was all over, and he was alone with the chill, and the darkening night, and his agony.

The other man had returned, the man who had wealth, and rank, and beauty, all the things that women love, and her heart had gone back to him, if indeed it had ever been out of his keeping.

Yet how brave she had been, poor soul, in trying to keep her faith; how firmly and gently she had spoken! The thought came to him like a gleam of comfort; at least she had wished to be true.

He could not think it out yet, the change was too new and appalling. He had sunk from his seat on the tree-trunk down to the earth, where he lay prone, in the attitude of all sufferers, his arms folded above the fallen leaves, and his face hidden.

He was very miserable—did God know how miserable, and had he been elected to suffer this always? If so, did such a lot fall to many men? Had many such a cup offered to them in mockery, and then withdrawn, leaving them to die of thirst? Did the ark of refuge often fail men so? Did the promised land often sink into deep waters, just as the weary feet touched its shore? If sorrows like his were a common destiny, then he could accept it more easily; he was not a coward.

He thought it all over, as he lay prostrate, with the chills of the soil numbing him, and the mists enveloping him—how he had seen her first by the little church gate; how she had offered him her friendship, and afterward her love; how he had been passive in it all, or seemed to have been.

He had been happy enough before she came—happy in resigned unexpectancy; but she had come, and that was all over. How was he to return to things as they had been? How would he bear the burden of all the heavy, coming years? Why, he was not thirty yet, and his life might stretch out to the allotted threescore years and ten. If so, how could he bear it—forty chill summers, forty cruel winters, forty years full of days and weeks made up, each one, of hours of pain? How could he bear it?

He rose tiredly from the earth, numbed and chilled, wet through with the dew and mists, and stumbled blindly upward. His hat had fallen off and lay among the dead leaves, but he did not miss it. A faint wind had risen, and a pale moon looked down on him mistily through moist scudding clouds. Along the line of the path which he followed toward the chateau a few houses stood, their wide-open doors permitting broad bands of light to fall across his path, and peals of rustic laughter to greet his ears. How happy the people seemed! He was almost glad now that they had never learned to think or feel as he had once wished them to do. If they had learned, doubtless they would have been less happy.

Above him the castle towered black against the sky, with yellow gleams where the casements were. He crossed the courtyard twice before he had strength to enter the little side door, which was left every day ajar for him. For him! What a mockery that seemed now!

He stood outside for a moment, and looked in. There was the old hall, his favorite part of the house, and there were the pictures he and she had hung together, and the old armor they had spent a whole day in polishing, and the organ which had sighed to his love and rapture a score of times. And now he was looking his last on them.

He could not bear the sight, lest it should unnerve him. He lifted the latch softly and went in.

She was in her favorite attitude by the log fire, and she started and half rose as he entered. She seemed relieved at first that it was he, before she noticed his stained dress, his haggard face, and the weary trouble in his eyes.

"What is the matter? Where have you been?" she asked hurriedly, with a tone of affright.

He drew back and put away the hands she extended.

"I have been fighting a battle and gaining a victory," he said.

"What battle—what victory?"

"A battle between my better nature and my worse. The better—I believe it is the better—has won."

"I do not understand you."

He came over to the hearth, and stood there in a weary, drooping attitude, with a faint animal sense of comfort in the warmth.

"You know I had chosen once a hard life—almost ascetic, almost monastic—for myself. Such must fall to some men. I thought, 'Why not to me as well as to another?' and I came here, leaving temptations behind."

She inclined her head. She could not answer him.

"But temptation followed me in a guise most fair, most sweet, and I yielded to it."

He turned away, that he might not see even her shadow as she stood drooping before him, and then went on more steadily:

"But happiness was not for me. It weakened me; it stood between me and duty; and knowing that, I have come to give it up."

"Oh, Henri!"

A wave of uncomprehended feeling broke over her, a consciousness of something like dismay. Was it possible that he had known of Frank's return, and was this his generous way of setting her free? But that could not be. Frank had come and gone so suddenly.

"You will not try to hinder me; you will not make duty hard by telling me you will be sorry?" He turned to her imploringly as he spoke. "What I am doing is surely best for me. It will be best for you, too—at least I shall strive and pray that it may be."

She came up and put her clasped hands over his shoulder, and looked at him with streaming eyes.

"Dear brother, if you will have it so," she said, brokenly; "whatever seems best to you will always be best in my eyes. I would have tried to make you happy if you had let me, but since you will have it otherwise I consent."

He shivered as she fell away from him. All was over.

* * * * * * * *

"We shall ride up to the auberge, leave our mules there, and then walk up to the parsonage, Frank."

"Very well, darling."

"Don't you think it was better we did not tell him we were coming, or any of our plans about him?"

"Of course it was."

Frank Dalby was not in the habit of pondering deeply on his wife's questions. Women's trains of thought were never worth following, at least so the gallant captain thought, and a placid assent was all any woman, even the dearest in the world, either desired or expected.

"He will be surprised, won't he, Frank, to known that I have never forgotten him for a day since we parted?"

"I should think so, indeed, and uncommonly pleased, too."

"And don't you think he is likely to consent to my plan, to come to England, and get ordained into the Anglican church—you know he can be as monastic there as ever he likes?"

"Of course he'll consent, and you can have him to play the organ at all your tea-drinking, and the women can lionize him so."

"Frank, you must not speak so—I don't like it," Connie said, gravely. "If ever I knew a saint and a man of genius, it was Henri de la Roche."

"A saint surely, since he considered you the world, the flesh, and the devil, and renounced you as such."

The young wife's lip quivered a little.

"I have a suspicion sometimes, in spite of myself, that he had some inspiration about you, and so gave me up."

"If that be so I'm very grateful to him."

Frank stopped his wife's words that he might kiss her.

"That is the little church there. How bleak and bare it looks, with all the humble turf-covered graves around it! Oh, we must take him away from it; we must give him a better field of labor elsewhere!"

"Of course we must."

"I was standing just there, Frank, by the gate, when he came down first to meet us."

"Do you know, Connie, if you talk any more about him I shall begin to grow jealous, and to think you regret him."

"But I don't, Frank; only it was another sort of life here, and coming back to it again effects me—you can't understand how."

"I can understand perfectly if you keep crying and making your eyes red over it."

Connie wiped two tears away furtively, and went on in silence. A little higher was the parsonage house, with its pointed roof, and bleak little court, and wooden balconies. How still it looked, how lonely, beneath the flying clouds, and within sound of the sighing of the pines! Oh, decidedly he must be removed from here, her brother, as she had called him, and as he had chosen to be.

She went to the door eagerly—the door that had still the natural tints of the wood, and devices carved over its face by the hand of some one who had loved him. Through the open window she could see into his study, fireless to-day, and with the faint light gleaming on the lettered bindings of his favorite books.

She knocked timidly, waited, and then knocked again.

"They are deaf or dead," the captain said impatiently, repeating the summons vigorously; and then there was a shuffling step in the passage, the step of the aged housekeeper, and the door opened reluctantly.

"We have come to see M. de la Roche; is he engaged?"

The old woman looked at her, looked her all over slowly, from her pretty boots to her flushed, eager face, but did not answer.

"Will you tell him I am here; say Mrs. Dalby—no, say Connie has come to speak with him."

The old woman's face changed, a look of loss and trouble stealing over it.

"Madame has not heard then." Her voice quivered, her head shook a little with the palsy of old age. "Madame comes too late. M. le Pasteur was buried a week ago."—All the Year Round.

THE WOMEN OF DOVER.

The tossing spray of Cocheco's fall
Hardened to ice on its rocky wall,
As through Dover town, in the chill gray dawn
Three women passed, at the cart-tail drawn!

Bared to the waist for the north winds grip,
And the keener sting of the constable's whip,
The blood that followed each hissing blow
Froze as it sprinkled the winter snow.

* * * * * *

When souls were fettered and thought was crime,
And heresy's whisper above its breath
Meant shameful scourging and bonds and death!

What marvel that, hunted and sorely tried,
Even women rebuked and prophesied,
And soft words rarely answered back
The grim persuasion of whip and rack.

If her cry from the whipping-post and jail
Pierced sharp as Kenite's driven nail,
O, woman, at ease in these happier days,
Forbear to judge of thy sister's ways!

How much thy beautiful life may owe
To her faith and courage thou canst not know.

WHAT WOMEN WANT TO KNOW.

Marriage of the Mascotte.

The fact that "Billy" West, the minstrel, went from Detroit to Tennessee and married Fay Templeton, has been noted. There was a dash of romance about the love affair of the merry minstrel and the piquant bouffer, and the gossips of the profession have had a great deal to say about it during the past year.

Miss Templeton has been on the stage since she was five or six years old, and became an enormous favorite in the South. She was a beautiful and precocious child. An old fashioned photograph, which hangs in the green room of the theater at Little Rock, Ark., shows her to have been slender and delicate, with great, earnest black eyes, exquisite features and a head crowned with roguish little curls. Her father, John Templeton, a typical Southerner with long black hair and sallow features, and her mother, Alice Vane, a sparkling soubrette who now at forty is as supple and winsome as the daughter, were for a time the only support of the infant phenomenon. When affairs became very prosperous Ellis Ryse, the big basso, and a contralto singer were secured. But Fay was the grand attraction, and she sang and danced in little farces and operettas, and many were her triumphal tours through the Southern circuit and even away down into the West Indies. The child prodigy developed into a charming woman. The thin limbs grew round and symmetrical, the big eyes blacker and saucier, and the crisp little curls became a wealth of raven ringlets which, when unconfined, as in the Mascotte, tumbled in bewildering profusion about plump shoulders and a trim little waist. Her voice was a rich and mellow contralto, not very well cultivated, but good enough for the requirements of the light opera. In short, Fay at eighteen was a stunner, and when Mr. Billy West first saw her head reclining on Pippo's breast, and heard her softly join in the Gobble, Gobble duet, he was, to use the comprehensive professional phrase, "paralyzed." When Miss Templeton went to the minstrels' matinee, and Mr. West, with his partner, Mr. Primrose, tripped lightly forth and began their genteel song and dance, she knew that her hour had come. The red velvet coat, the knee breeches which revealed the gentle curves of Mr. West's shapely calves, and the big diamond which sparkled on the expansive shirt front, made him simply ravishing in her eyes. Her infatuation was complete when Mr. West, shaved very smooth, dressed very sprucely and with the burnt cork carefully washed out of his ears, obtained an introduction through a member of her company. It was a mutual mash, and the elder Templetons soon took alarm. Their love for the girl was almost idolatry. Nothing was too good for her and no deprivation was too severe if it could add to her comfort. Fay had the choicest room at every hotel, and the parents would go higher up where the rate was cheaper. If there was an all-night ride, Fay had a section in the Pullman and the father and mother sat up in an ordinary coach. They have been known to do this time and again to cut down expenses. They deprived themselves all their lives, and lavished everything on the girl. They had bent all their energies to her professional advancement, and had placed her at the head of a well-balanced comic opera company. She was becoming a tremendous favorite everywhere, and her prospects were very bright. It was evident that the time was close at hand when there should come a golden reward for the years of anxious waiting and severe privation. The girl was young, beautiful, accomplished, and would soon be rich. There was no limit to the brilliancy of the future which they pictured for her. But it has been the old story over again. The prayers of the parents have been unheeded, the prospects for the future disregarded, the bouncing Fay is now the minstrel's bride and the old folks are disconsolate. Fay could have had her pick of the gilded and wealthy youths who paid her homage and overwhelmed her with flowers, and many people will think her unwise to "throw herself away on a nigger singer." What the result may be, or what effect the marriage will have on Fay's professional future, cannot be determined. It is interesting to note that Miss Templeton was not West's first love. There are two ladies in Detroit, moving high in society circles, and both happy wives and devoted mothers, who were engaged to him in their callow school girl days.

Dresses at a Royal Reception.

The princess of Wales has held a drawing room at Buckingham palace by command of the queen. It was very largely attended, and St James' park, which is just now in the full beauty of spring, was crowded during the afternoon to see the arrivals at the palace gates. The afternoon was so favorable for sight-seeing that a larger number than usual gathered along the Mall and about the gates of the palace; and after all had passed into the quadrangle, there was a general move toward the walk on the banks of the lake, where the music of the Guards' band could be enjoyed as well as in the hotter and more dusty road. The band of the Horse Guards first took up a position inside the palace gates, with a detachment of the troops on the opposite side. Then the band of the Coldstream Guards marched down with the guard of honor, which is always stationed inside the quadrangle, and lastly the Life Guards' band marched through the palace gates, the gay carriages of the nobility attracting a fair amount of attention on the part of the crowd meanwhile. As the prince and princess of Wales drove down, attended by their usual escort, they were loudly cheered by those who lined the whole of the way. The duke and duchess of Connaught, the Princess Beatrice, the duke of Cambridge, Prince Christian, Princess Henry of the Netherlands, the hereditary prince and princess of Saxe-Meiningen were among those present at the drawing room. The Court Circular gives the following description of the dresses worn by the princesses: The princess of Wales wore a dress of ciel blue satin duchesse, embroidered in silver gilt draperies of finest Brussels lace, looped with a large bouquet of roses and lilies; train of ciel brocade embroidered in various colored flowers and trimmed with satin; corsage to correspond. Headdress—a tiara of diamonds, feathers and veil; ornaments, pearls and diamonds. Orders—Victoria and Albert, the Crown of India, St. Catherine of Russia, St. John of Jerusalem, and the Danish Family Order. Princess Beatrice wore a train and body of white corded silk, lined with satin and bordered with pompadour mousseline-de-soie, and a petticoat of white satin duchesse, draped with pompadour and looped up with bunches of shaded roses corresponding with the design of the mousseline-de-soie. Headdress—feathers, veil, diamonds and emeralds. Ornaments—diamonds and emeralds. Orders—Victoria and Albert, the Crown of India, the Portuguese and the Saxe-Coburg and Gotha Family Order. The duchess of Connaught wore a corsage and train of rich prune and gold brocade, lined with pale blue satin, and a petticoat of white satin, draped with tulle and duchess lace, fastened up with hyacinths and sprays of gold. Headdress—a tiara of diamonds, feathers and veil; ornaments, diamonds. Orders—Victoria and Albert, the Crown of India, Louise of Prussia, the Saxe-Cobug and Gotha Family Order, and the Medal of the Golden Wedding of the Emperor of Germany.

How Washington Women Dress.

Several Washington ladies, says the Philadelphia Times, have taken advantage of the fashions and devised styles which they consider are best suited to them. In some instances these styles are orignal with themselves. Mrs. Don Cameron, at a german given this spring, on which occasion the palm of belleship was accorded her, wore a becoming toilet of white, trimmed with snow balls, and had on neither gloves nor bracelets. The waist of her dress was made with very short sleeves and cut low in the neck. Mrs. Frances Hodgson Burnett, the novelist, has adopted the so-called æsthetic style of dress. At a recent entertainment in Washington she wore a white China silk, flowered in a very large pattern, with a gathered waist, which was very short and very low in the neck, and without sleeves, and a long, straight, full-trained skirt, gathered to the belt at the waist. She calls these waists "agoos," that being the first word an infant usually utters, and the style of waist being generally known as "baby waists." She frequently wears sunflowers with her evening dresses. On the other hand, Mrs. Vinnie Ream Hoxie, at the same party, wore a classical style of dress, resembling that of the goddess Minerva, especially in the arrangement of the hair and ornaments used on the head. Another Washington lady, who also has a taste for an original style of dress, has driven her dressmaker half crazy by telling her, in regard to one of her costumes: "Now, remember, that is the dress you are to make me look like a statue in." The poor modiste said afterward that she was tormented day and night with the endeavor to devise such a garment. "For how can I make her look like a statue," she plaintively exclaimed, "in any dress in which she can walk, even in a ball room?" This latter lady was at Saratoga last summer during the Egyptian war, and often wore in the evening ornaments and a style of dress suggestive of Cleopatra.

A Graceful Maryland Girl.

At the battle of Antietam Captain Coleman Brown, of a Georgia regiment, was killed, and his sword was turned over by Dr. Knott, surgeon of his regiment, to a young lady who had attracted his attention by her kindness to the Confederate wounded, and she provided a hiding place for the weapon in the attic of her residence. The name of the young lady was Grove, but until recently all that Dr. Knott could ascertain was that the Grove family had removed to Baltimore. Recently the arrival at Atlanta of Miss Julia Grove of Maryland was chronicled in the personal column of an Atlanta paper. Struck by the name, and her place of residence, Dr. Knott addressed a note to her, and in reply received an answer stating that she was a sister to the lady who had ministered so tenderly to the wounded and dying at Sharpsburg. He then called on her and related the circumstances connected with the concealment of Capt. Brown's sword. The lady promised to have the old house searched on her return home, and some time afterward Dr. Knott received a letter from her, announcing the success of the search and the recovery of the trusty blade. A few days later Dr. Knott received the sword by express, and it was turned over to Capt. Brown's relatives. When some one spoke of the act of Miss Grove as a "graceful" one, Dr. Knott, who is a gallant widower, responded: "All Maryland girls are graceful; at least, I used to think so when I was soldiering in that section."

What It Costs Her to Dress.

"It doesn't require a mint of money to dress a young lady," said a teacher in the city schools to a young man who, with the nureasoning propensity of this generation, was kicking vigorously on account of the large amounts of wealth which he alleged were annually squandered by women. "It might surprise you to know how little a woman's wardrobe really represents," she continued.

"Suppose you give me an estimate," returned the young man, who, it may be said, is a candidate for matrimony, and for that reason felt a lively interest in the subject.

"Of course," said the young lady, glancing over her neatly-fitting, well-made dress with the slightest perceptible air of pride, which was very pardonable, "I am better acquainted with the cost of my own raiment than with that of any one else, and I'll have to base my figures on personal experience. I think there are few girls whose expenses for clothing exceed $200 annually. My expenses do not amount to more than that, and I have to hire nearly all my sewing done. The items would be: Two tailor made dresses, $30; a silk dress, $30; underclothing, $15—that is to say, the materials could be bought for that; hats and bonnets, $35; gloves, $10; shoes, $14; incidentals—collars, cuff, laces, stockings and other articles—would not amount to more than $60. Some years the expenses might run up a little higher, as a new circular or cloak would become necessary, but the cost of the average young lady's apparel will not exceed $200 very often."

The Latest Wrinkle in Shoulders.

New York Letter: The shoulders of our belles look as though lifted by a chronic shrug. I am trustworthily informed that this effect is produced by padding, and that the artful creatures have simply changed their spots of falsity, in order to produce that lithe, lank length which fashion just now prescribes for their bodies. Certain corset devices, too, give an appearance of no corsets at all. The aim of all this is to make the young lady seem to be in a state of unlaced naturalness. Success is achieved about one time in a hundred. The use of what I believe is called the Newport scarf is more generally attended by satisfactory results. A heavy, soft fringed and brocaded strip of stuff, three to five yards long, is wrapped round the figures in ways that are in the main picturesque. The hips may be wound with it or the shoulders draped, or the breast crossed, or the head hooded. This is one of the few articles of fashionable adornment that the eyes of an artist can rest on with approval, and as for the impressionable amateur observer, the sight of a pretty girl artistically decorated with a Newport scarf, is apt to bring on an attack of heart disease and prostrate him before her right there on the parlor floor.

House Decoration.

Japanese goods, says a London correspondent, are going out of fashion, excepting when genuinely ancient. This is accounted for by the deluge we have had of cheap Japanese toys and porcelains. Still, good old oriental china keeps its place and is as much in vogue as ever. Another very lovely item of decoration is the porcelain mosaic dado and frieze-work, which is greatly used in country houses, where, by the way, the old-fashioned Dutch tiles are extremely popular, as they are clean and cheerful. I see many people are already beginning to ornament the exterior of their houses with those bright and clean, quaint and picturesque tiles which are still so common in Spain, Portugal and Mexico. I need not say that flowers are more in fashion than ever, and that no room is considered complete without them, and also a quantity of growing, large-leafed exotics, palms and ferns, in marble or brass vases on pedestals.

A very beautiful footstool, says the New York Times, considered purely from the ornamental standpoint, has recently been made to order as a wedding gift. Mounted on inlaid wood, it is of octagon shape, and the stuffing is of considerable height, covered in rich, cream-colored satin, a wreath of forget-me-nots, worked in natural colors, surrounding a double monogram in raised embroidery. As a piece of fine needle-work this æsthetic footstool is most beautiful, and as a wedding gift it is scarcely derogatory to say that it looked as if it must be kept under a glass case. In that respect it is not unlike many of the royal footstools which, moth-eaten and disfigured, may be seen in the museums of Europe.

Flat frames for mirrors are made with very handsome effect. They may be covered with plush or velvet, or stained to imitate wood. If covered, the material may be worked with such designs as may occur to the fancy of the amateur—flowers of brilliant and showy colors, birds with long, richly-colored plumage, and a diversity of other ideas, blossoms, vines, turfs, etc. If the wood is stained, it offers an opportunity for the employment of a painting skill, and the frame may be elaborated with painted plaques or even landscape sketches, a tall tree upon the side spreading its branches over the top of the mirror, and its root sinking into the grass shown at the bottom of the glass.—[Decorator and Furnisher.

Many beautiful things may be made from ugly ones. A pretty ebonized music stand, covered with rich dark blue velveteen and fringed with bright Parsian colors may be made from an old washstand. How this is accomplished you will now be told. Remove the back of any old wooden stand; nail on a board twenty inches by seventeen. Ebonize this by dissolving an ounce of shellac in a pint of alcohol, and when this is thoroughly dissolved add lamp black until it is of the desired blackness. Tack the velveteen over the shelf. Buy the best quality of velveteen, as it looks like plush. For fringe take the worsted chenille which costs 40 cents a yard.

Madras muslins are now printed with copies from cathedral windows, where geometrical figures and picturesque patterns are produced in full reds, purple, various shades of olive-green, blue and yellow and somber brown and gray. The resemblance to stained glass when this muslin is tightly stretched across the window frame is deceiving.

Bedroom hangings may be in one color. Soft blues or pinks or delicate creams, bright withal but not gaudy, and fringes of the same color, with cords and tassels, will be sufficient ornamentation. Economical, effective and tasteful material can easily be found in the large varieties of cretonnes and Madras.

Foibles of Fashion.

Very large hats in fine colored straws, trimmed with a profusion of ostrich plumes, are shown, but are not destined to very great popularity. Fashionable ladies are apparently getting tired of these immense structures, which have been overdone and exaggerated until what was once considered picturesque and unique has come to be exceedingly common. Gipsy pokes and little princesse bonnets, composed of very natural looking blossoms and leaves, and gypsy bonnets of tinted China crape are just now the most charming head-dresses exhibited. Thus, a bonnet of wall flowers has a scarf of almond-colored crape fulled around the brim, with the long ends tied at the side. Another is made of peach-colored crape laid in soft folds over the crown. Peach-colored Spanish lace is waved around the crown, and underneath each fall of the lace are set tiny bouquets of crushed tea roses and foliage. A row of lace also edges the brim. The materials for these bonnets are arranged with great care and elegance, a lovely model for a blonde of pure type being of English violets and cream-white lace, and for a decided brunette, a bonnet of primrose crape with garniture of gold lace and clusters of scarlet carnations.

A beautiful garden party dress, designed for a Newport belle, is of olive satin surah with very deep ruffles of olive Spanish lace nearly covering the skirt. A narrow scarf of olive satin, brocaded with tiniest red moss rose buds, beginning at the throat, is brought down, caught lightly at the waist, forms paniers at each side, and is carried in and out among the lace trimmings in the back. The capote bonnet is made of olive lace veiling, a semi-wreath of red roses and moss buds, and the parasol is of olive, edged with olive lace, and lined with coral red merveilleux.

A plaid dress to be a success requires much care in the making. You can tell a plaid dress made by an artist at a glance. Give a true hand a fabric of this pattern to make up and you will have it sent home so judiciously mingled with a plain silk matching one of the dark colors of the plaid that you would never take it for the same dress made by an inartistic person. Some of the most stylish checks are box-pleated from the waist down, every three pleats or so having fan pleats of silk or satin inserted around the lower half of the skirt. These pleats are sometimes made of velvet or woolen material.

Some of the newest brocaded gauzes have designs so rich and heavy as to closely resemble hand embroidery; these solid black goods have single sprays of flowers, such as hyacinths, tulips, roses, and daisies, scattered at wide intervals over plain ground. A very beautiful dress is produced by taking one of these gauzes and embroidering the brocade figure with cut jet beads. Enough of the material is beaded in this manner to form corsage and skirt draperies. The costume thus arranged has a very elegant effect.

A lovely young bride in New York wore at the belt of her wedding dress of cream satin a dainty half-basket made of pearls and lace over a foundation of gold wire. The basket was filled with orange blossoms, white lilacs and primroses, with tiny garlands of delicate vine and small white blossoms falling over her dress from the edges of the basket.

A pretty novelty consists in tinted satin gilets or waistcoats embroidered in sprays of arbutus, lilies-of-the-valley, or other fine flowers, or worked all over with white silk rosebuds, outlined with tiny mother-of-pearl beads. These pretty vests can be worn with different toilets.

New kerchiefs for the neck, with mouchoirs to correspond, are made of pale yellow washing silk, embroidered in gayest colors in designs of bees, humming-birds, roses and buds, and large butterflies with brilliant colored wings.

The most fashionable stockings are of black, strawberry, or primrose, silk or lisle, in monochrome; stripes and checks being only second in popularity.

White Danish kid gloves, decorated with lilies of the valley, are worn by bridesmaids.

Chicken-down yellow is announced as a later tint of that shade than primrose.

Flower bonnets are again in high favor.

Household Hints.

The perfection to which the drying and evaporating of fruit has arrived may well give the busy housewife pause. The ordeal of canning fruit which, in addition to much other hard work, is so dreaded, may to a great extent be done away with, and supplies of the dried fruit be provided instead. Think of this, and do not shudder to see the trees so full of bloom; but one fact must be borne in mind, the dried fruit needs care, to keep it free from worms, and then the preparation of it for the table must have thought. Some fruit needs to lie in water all night, some is better if hot water is poured over it and it is stewed quickly. The dried apricots, which make such rich and luscious sauce, gain by this process. Use a small quantity of water, and sweeten the juice so that it will be almost thick with sugar.

Lemon cream, which is nice for the filling of a pie, or for a layer cake, tarts, or in place of sauce, is made in this way: The quantity can be indefinitely increased, but the proportion should be the same: one lemon, with the rind grated and the inner portion cut up fine with a knife, not in a chopping-bowl, for much of the juice is wasted then: one cup of sugar, two-thirds of a cup of water, half a cup of butter, and three eggs. Let the lemon, sugar, and butter come to a boil before adding the well-beaten eggs; when it thickens take from the fire, and let it cool before using. If eggs are not plenty, use two eggs and a tablespoonful of common flour, rubbed smooth in water.

When tired of the usual salad dressing, try this: Rub an ounce of butter and nearly a teaspoonful of flour together till smooth, then put it in a basin or stew-pan on the top of the stove, with equal quantities of weak vinegar and gravy stock—about half a teacupful of each should be allowed for the quantity of butter mentioned. Do not let this boil, but let it simmer gently. When it begins to thicken add the yolk of one egg. This is very nice with lettuce and cold potato salad.

A good dish to be eaten cold for supper is made by taking a piece of round steak, spread some butter on it, and then cover it with a force meat made of bread crumbs, heavy seasoned with pepper, salt and sage; roll the steak, and fasten it together, bake it, basting it freely with butter and water. When it is tender take from the oven and let it get perfectly cold. Cut it in slices right down through the force meat and all.

A handsome easel can be made at small expense. Have a frame of common whitewood made, see that the proportions are good, then cover it entirely with velvet, plush or satin, or even velveteen of good quality may be used. An easel five feet high will serve to hold quite a good-sized picture, and will make it a much more prominent picture than if it were hung on the wall.

It is not generally known that mint sauce will keep it bottled, and be as good, or even better, than when freshly gathered. Of course, I do not mean that it will keep indefinitely, but for a week or ten days at least. This will be good news to the family to whom it is not alone the first swallow, but the first mint sauce, which makes the summer.

If your lace bedspread and pillow covers are soiled, wash them, and, instead of bluing them, dip them in some very weak cold coffee, and they will receive from it a delicate shade of ecru, which is so popular for laces just now. Curtains and other articles of the kind may be treated in the same way.

If is a good thing to save some of the fat when cooking lamb. Use what you require for the gravy, and then save the rest, so that when you roast your next saddle of lamb you can lay little lumps of this fat on the top of it when it is put in the oven. Sprinkle salt and pepper over it also.

If dried pumpkin is put soaking at night in sweet milk it will be ready for use in the morning; if there are any small lumps left in it they can be rubbed smooth with a spoon.

To quiet the burning of ivy-poisoned hands, wet them with hot lime-water. This will be efficacious sometimes when nothing else does any good.

TO THE CITY OF ST. PAUL.

Hail, city of beauty! How fair in thy youth!
When time in thy future shall garner the truth,
And write on the years the record sublime
Of grandeur and wealth in the glow of thy prime,
Then, blent with thy glory, from land and from sea,
The gems of the world shall be gathered to thee!

We know thee and loved thee with dawn of the years
That watched thy young growth with hopes or with fears;
Then, strong in thy future, secure in thy lot,
When lonely and severed the world knew thee not;
When the tie which alone held the world to thy fate
Was the far-reaching river that flowed at thy gate!

The scope of thy presence now girdles the hills;
Thy feet touch the springs of a commerce that fills
The breadth of thy footstool, where life's rushing stream
Hurries on like the mingled romance of a dream;
And far-reaching lines bind thy life to a world
Whose life to thy vision is hourly unfurled!

When the warm flush of autumn, the azure of sky,
And hues ever-changing in contrast go by,
What beauties link hands to the distance afar
When one waits the light of the evening star,
And the sunset awakens, o'er woodland and stream,
A vision unmatched by pencil or dream!

There Snelling, rock-seated, o'erlooks from her height
The mingling of waters that blend in the light;
From winding hillsides which the waters enfold,
Come shadows that waver with purple and gold;
With soft undulations, in seeming, they glide
Here and there with the current that ruffles the tide.

'Twere well, thou fair city, hast nature and thee,
In the wealth of her beauty, but met to agree!
Utility's hand, all ruthless and rude,
'Twixt nature and thee engendered a feud;
Yet vain was the mission of mattock and spade,
For man failed to rule what nature had made!

CROOKSTON, - MINNESOTA.

A late writer says, one of the mos effective ways of making the farm home happy is to rake off the mortgage. This is doubtless true, but a better way is never to let a mortgage get on it, save in a case of dire necessity. How some people can spend their whole lives in a mortgaged home, passes comprehension

Last year 525,000,000,000 gallons of ager beer were made in the United States, on an average of about fourteen gallons to each inhabitant. A beer mug usually contains half a pint, we are told, so that the amount of malt liquors manufactured last year was divided up into 4,200,000,000 drinks, which at five cents a drink would amount to $210,000,000. Beer has been termed a German national beverage, but these statistics show that it is fast becoming an American beverage.

A law for the encouragement of large families has been proposed in France, and considering the growing tendency toward celibacy in that country there is a good deal of sense in it. The law provides that every head of a family who has more than four children shall be entitled to a reduction of fifteen per cent. on his annual taxes, and to an additional reduction of five per cent. for each child in excess of five. In case the father does not pay taxes in excess of 100 francs a year he shall be entitled to a premium of 200 francs for his fifth child, 300 francs for his sixth, 400 for the seventh, and so on.

Cen. Beauregard is represented as saying there is a steady diminution in the number of negroes in those parts of the south that have come under his observations. Gen. Beauregard's view is not borne out by the census. In 1860 there were 4,441,000 negroes in the United States; in 1870, 4,880,000; in 1880, 6,580,000. The increase from 1860 to 1870 was 440,000; and from 1870 to 1880 it was 1,700,000, the rate for the last decade having been 35 per cent. The entire population of the country increased not quite 30 per cent. in this last decade; so that the negroes show a larger percentage of ncrease than the most of the population ishows. This indicates pretty clearly that the negroes are holding their own.

Iowa has recently been the scene of several lynchings of murderers and outaws, and the general verdict is that hey richly deserved their fate, but that death should have followed such crimes as were committed by them in "due course of law" rather than at the hands of the outraged people. But the law having failed there was no other method of administering justice. The Des Moines Register has some remarks on this business which are of general application. "Human life has been cheapened in Iowa, and nearly as much by lenient courts as by murderous men, until the people feel that by Judge Lynch alone may its value and security be enhanced and murder discouraged For twenty years not a murderer has been hanged in Iowa! A reliable and intelligent gentleman who has paid special attention to this subject, says that two hundred or more persons have been murdered in Iowa in these twenty years in which not a single murderer has been hanged, and a very few sent to the penitentiary for life. The number of murderers he gives is high—we think too high—but we may readily believe i when this one county contributes fourteen of the number, and we do not know but five or six more. What a comment on the efficiency and the faithfulness of the Iowa courts in this. With courts so faithful, with able lawyers ready to lend their ability to murderers, not only to gain for them a light punishment, but to turn them loose to go on killing, and with murder trials having no result but to impose enormous costs and acquit the murderers, what wonder is there that Judge Lynch is appealed to?"

Referring to the recent army scandals arising from too much poker, the New York Times sarcastically says: "What must be done at West Point is to place the department of poker in the charge of a professor who thoroughly understands the modern game, and who will teach it at least as well as it is taught in any other institution. Such a man as ex-Minister Schenck, could his services be obtained, would soon place West Point abreast of the age in poker. Doubtless, the West Point cadets are well educated in many branches of mathematics, but they must be so educated in poker that there will be an end of scandals caused by incompetant poker players on the part of army officers. It is disgraceful that a West Point graduate should be unable to hold his own against a civilian, and should thus be tempted to employ in poker government funds intrusted to him for other purposes. Let him be a thorough master of the game—one who knows just when to come in and when to stay in, who has the whole science of drawing at his fingers' ends, and for whom no jack pot has the slightest terrors, and we can once more feel proud of West Point.

Ancient Order of United Workmen.

At the convention in Buffalo, the Ancient Order of United Workmen debated at great length and voted down a proposition of Levi of Minnesota, to amend the constitution to the effect that a suspended member may pay his assessment to the financier of the lodge to which he belongs, and such action shall be equivalent to reinstatement. A proposition to adjust and reduce the number of representatives to the supreme lodge was rejected. A proposition to send notices of suspension to subordinate lodge officers for failure to make monthly returns was referred to a committee. In the afternoon the election of officers was proceeded with, resulting as follows: Supreme M. W. M. Fish, California; supreme foreman Milton E. Beebe; supreme receiver, S. S. Davis, Pennsylvania, re-elected; supreme overseer, W. G. Morris, Illinois; supreme watchman, William R. Graham, Iowa; supreme guide, T. H. Presnell, Minnesota; supreme trustee, S. Eccles, Jr., Missouri; examining physician, Dr. W. C. Richards, St. Louis, re-elected.

Mr. St. John, ex-governor of Kansas, is afflicted with some wicked neighbors, who tried to burn his dwelling house at Olathe the other day.

PITH OF THE NEWS.

EVENTS IN WASHINGTON.

Although the star route trial is not ended, the record up to this point is the largest ever made in a criminal trial in this country. Printed in small type and octavo size, it comprises over 6,000 pages, or about 4,250,000 words. The report of preliminary proceedings up to the date when the taking of testimony begun covered 463 pages. The direct testimony for the prosecution occupies 2,318 pages. Merrick delivered the longest speech of the trial, lasting nine days and covering 283 pages. The record of the Guiteau trial comprised 2,700 pages, and was regarded as of extraordinary length, but becomes quite insignificant compared with this enormous record.

Washington Special: In an interview this morning with Chi Young, secretary of the Chinese legation at Washington, he stated that there was no doubt if France should refuse to recognize the sovereign protectorate of China over its dependency of Anam, hostilities would be inevitable—that while the cause of the quarrel was strictly between the Anamese and the French, China could not afford to permit any interference of France, even if countenanced by the king of Anam, the vassal of China, and would interpose at all hazards.

There is a scheme on foot to induce congress to authorize and bear the expense of the preparation and publication of an official history of the United States, covering the period between 1789 and 1889. The promoters of this scheme are evidently at work to secure the aid and co-operation of historical societies and kindred organizations with a view to using the influence thus obtained with senators and representatives next winter.

The Major Wasson prosecution has been emasculated by the payment of the full amount of the deficit. The major prior to his arraingment drew a check for the full shortage on the First National bank, Galveston, and the same was tendered to Chief Paymaster Terrell in satisfaction. The check was forwarded to Galveston, and notification of payment has been received. The effect of the settlement is variously estimated, but the friends of the accused hope for acquittal.

FOREIGN NEWS GOSSIP.

A stormy debate arose in the house of commons on a motion to recommit the Lord Wolseley and Baron Alcester annuity bills, for the purpose of commuting the proposed pensions for lump sums of money. Sir Wilfred Lawson (Radical) and Lord Randolph Churchill (conservative) opposed the motion. The latter alleged that inquiry into the Egyptian war was first necessary. The original war, he said, was disgraceful, not glorious. As the government's puppet, the khedive was the real author of the massacres at Alexandria. Sir Stafford Northcote (conservative) supported the government. The opposition to the grants he characterized as shabby. In the present raising of a question as to the policy of the war, he declined to be led by Churchill, and he hoped the house would not be induced by the noble lord to accept a position degrading to its honor. Gladstone declared that Churchill's allegation, in regard to the khedive, was entirely at variance with all evidence. Churchill promised to give proofs of his statements, if the government would grant a proper inquiry.

Next to the passage of the land and arrears act, the most important victory gained by the Irish parliamentary party is the acceptance by the government of the laborers' dwellings bill which was read a second time without opposition last week. If passed in anything like the shape proposed by its authors, it will create a revolution in the life and condition of the most miserable portion of the population of Ireland. It confers compulsory powers on local authorities, and provides for the erection of suitable houses with garden plats for agricultural laborers. Parliament having accepted the principle, will be compelled to carry the bill into effect in one way or another.

St. Petersburg Cable: By command of the czar a letter has been sent to Minister Hunt asking him to convey the thanks of the czar to President Arthur for the courtesy shown in specially according Hunt to represent the United States at the coronation, and also to express his majesty's gratification at Admiral Baldwin being sent on board the frigate to attend the grand solemnity. M. De Giers concludes by saying it has been particularly agreeable to his majesty to see this mark of consideration from a nation "united to Russia by bonds of traditional friendship."

In the house of lords, recently, the bill legalizing a marriage with a diseased wife's sister, passed its second reading by a vote of 165 to 158. The Prince of Wales, Duke of Connaught and Duke of Albany voted for the bill. Two archbishops and nineteen bishops voted against it.

A brilliant review took place recently on the Petroffsky plain of 55,000 troops. The emperor and empress left at 6 this afternoon for Peterhoff. The outcome of the coronation will, it is thought in well informed circles, be the adoption of conservative measures at home and a pacific policy abroad.

Horrible Method of Murder.

In the Leith Tredgar Iron Works at Chattanooga, Tenn., on Friday last a difficulty ccurred between two employes, Lafayette Browder and William Thomas, in which Browder tried to murder his antagonist by burning him to death on a red hot iron slab that was being prepared for converting into nails. When taken from the slab Thomas presented a sickening sight. From his head to his heels he was a mass of blister, his back and legs being almost roasted to crisp. The witnesses on the trial testified that the appearance of the unfortunate man was most horrible and that a number of persons were compelled to leave the presence of the body to escape fainting. It was with difficulty that Browder could be dragged off the poor fellow, and he seemed determined to roast him alive. The muscles of the shoulders and the tendons of the legs are frightfully burned, and should the wretched man recover, which is doubtful, he will hardly be able to work at his trade. Thomas' cries were heartrending, and his efforts to escape the clutches of his tormentor well told the agony he was suffering.

Big Wisconsin Failure.

Writs of an attachment to the amount of $100,000 have been issued against the property of T. G. Mandt, heavy wagon manufacturer of the city of Stoughton, Dane county Wisconsin, and he is forced into bankruptcy with liabilities variously estimated at from $200,000 to $250,000, while his assets will not exceed $100,000. The principal creditors are residents of Stoughton and vicinity, wholesale iron and lumber dealers in Milwaukee and Chicago and the First National and State banks of this city, the last two being in the amount of $7,000 each. Col. William F. Vilas of Madison, attorney for the bankrupt, claims assets for his client sufficient to liquidate liabilities, and says Mandt will pay his indebtedness in full if the creditors will give him a little time. The insolvency of Mandt is attributed in no manner to the fire which partially consumed his works upon Jan. 13, but is the result of transacting heavy business by means of borrowed capital.

Last End of an Ex-Chicago Millionaire.

William A. Putney, at one time proprietor of one of the largest dry goods houses of Chicago, and rated among the millionaires, became hopelessly involved, and finally gave up his business on account of impaired health. Detectives traced the thefts to Putney, and he was arrested at his summer cottage, Nantucket. The officers, with their prisoner, took a steamer to Boston. Suddenly, while chatting with the officers, he plunged overboard. He was taken from the water by the boat's crew, and died in ten minutes, aged 52. A large amount of stolen property was found in his residence at Boston and Nantucket.

Gen. Crook Right Side Up.

A dispatch from Tombstone, Arizona. dispels all apprehensions for the safety of Gen. Crook's command. It says: Sorghum Smith arrived from Chihuahua recently, bringing information that Crook had returned from his expedition and was encamped at Silver creek, south end of Chihuahua, which he reached in the afternoon, sixty miles southeast of this place. Loco Chatto and 230 hostiles had surrendered, and were brought in by Crook, who again recrossed the line. Among the prisoners were seventy-five bucks, old Sick, and the rest women and children. It is believed that Crook will return and endeavor to capture the warriors. His command is in good fighting trim. The casualties so far are nothing.

The police at Boston are looking for John L. Sullivan, the champion pugilist, who is charged with a serious assault on his wife. They have hunted high and low for him for the last two days without success. Thursday night he wound up an extensive spree by going home in a decidedly ugly frame of mind. He began to abuse his wife, and becoming angry at her remonstrances, proceeded to maintain his reputation by squaring off and knocking her out in one round. Sullivan is on probation now for a similar offense and it is more likely that it will go hard with him if he is ever brought into court again.

The Interior of Greenland.

Baron Nordenskjold is now fairly on his way to Greenland, for the exploration of both coasts and of the interior of that island continent. His programme is given at length in Nature for May 10. The following extracts contain his hypothesis as to the interior:

"The geological nature of Greenland, very similar to that of Scadanavia, seems to indicate a similar orographical formation, viz., formation formed of mountainous ridges alternating with deep valleys and plains; while one may even assume that the culminating line of the land in Greenland runs, as in England and Sweden and in both American continents, along the west coast. The winds, therefore, which should produce snow in the interior, must, if coming from the Atlantic, have in the first instance crossed the broad ice-belt generally encircling the east coast of Greenland, and then the mountains on the coast, some of which we know are very high, and, if coming from Davis Sound, the mountain ridge itself. In both cases the wind would assume the character of the 'Fohn' wind, i. e., it must, after passing the mountain-chains on the coasts, be dry and comparatively warm.

These causes are not only the reason of the dry warm 'Fohn' wind in Switzerland, and the very remarkable circumstance that it is under winds from the snow-covered mountains that the snow disappears in Swedish Lapland, but they play also an important part in the climatic conditions of the whole globe. They are, for example, the cause of the difference in climate and flora of the two sides of the Andes, of the east and west coasts of Tierra del Fuego, and the eastern and western parts of Australia. They are the chief course of the deserts which cover the interiors of Asia, Australia, the northern portion of Africa, and certain parts of America, while in Sweden they produce the constant western winds, and the consequent prolonged drought which invariably occurs in spring time in the central part of the country. The same laws of the temperature and moisture of the air must also prevail in Greenland. Here too the ocean winds must be moist, and this moisture is usually deposited in the form of snow on the mountains along the coast, whereas all those reaching the interior, whether from east, west, north, or south, must—if the orographical construction of the country is not entirely different from that of others on the globe—be dry and comparatively warm. And in consequence of this circumstance, the snow-falls in the interior of Greenland cannot be sufficient for maintaining a 'perpetual' inland ice.

"It cannot, however, be asserted that the country should here form a deserted treelees tundra; one encounters in Siberia forests with giant trees under climatic condition far more severe than those we may assume are to be found in the interior of Greenland. That the country should prove true to its name has besides been asserted by the celebrated botanist Hooker, from his studies of the flora of Greenland, and even the natives on the west coast themselves have a suspicion that such is the case, from the large herds of reindeer which from time to time are seen to migrate across the inland ice to the west coast. It is most probable that the interior, if free from ice, is like a North European high plateau, with a flora far more copious than that of the coast. But this I maintain, that whether the interior of Greenland is richly covered with forests, as the land round tundra, or even a desert of perpetual ice, the solution of the problem of its real nature is so important, and of such consequence to science, that that there could hardly, at the present moment, be conceived an object more worthy of an Arctic expedition than to ascertain the true condition of the interior of this particular country."

Never Had Teeth.

Says the Montana Independent: A man who never in his life had a tooth in his jaws at one time resided in Montana. This fact was brought to the recollection of an old resident of this city by seeing a statement in an Eastern paper that one of the most wonderful natural curiosities of the age is a ten-year-old Georgia boy who never had any teeth, and never showed any signs that he ever will have any. The man referred to above was sixty years old, and had never had teeth. His name was Joseph Bearclaw. He was a resident of Adler Gluch, in 1864 and 1865. Although Nature failed to supply Mr. Bearclaw with teeth, she tried to make amends by furnishing him with long, strong finger-nails and toe-nails, which were almost as hard as bone, and fully an eighth of an inch thick. It is not known whether he got the name of Bearclaw from this circumstance, or if that was properly his name. He was from Illinois, to which state he returned in 1865 or 1866.

The report of the state secretary was submitted by Rev. J. A. McGowan, Owatonna, as follows: Last year we reported 1,326 schools; now we have 1,444, an increase of 118. We now have 11,000 officers and teachers and more than 76,600 scholars, an increase of 976 teachers and 4,776 scholars. As compared with two years ago the increase is 2,237 officers and 11,150 scholars; $33,176 have been expended on the rhool during the year.

Hennepin county takes the lead, having 1,109 officers and teachers and 11,049 scholars, showing an increase of 129 officers and teachers and 2,017 scholars during the year. Ramsey county stands second, with 746 officers and teachers and 5,620 scholars.

Delegates from Dakota, and other sections gave cheering accounts of the work in their localities, and addresses were made by many others, and lively discussions were had upon various topics.

The committee on resolutions reported twelve pertaining to Sunday school work—for keeping the libraries above contamination by impure or vicious publications; the promotion of missionary zeal in our schools; expressing high appreciation of the labors of the secretary; calling attention of superintendents to the financial demands of school work, etc. The treasurer, C. W. Hackett of St. Paul, then submitted the annual report. During the year, $378.49 have been expended and $230,23 received, leaving a deficit of $148,26, beside some bills which are not yet in.

The committee on delegates to the Louisville convention reported the following: Hon. Thomas Simpson, Winona; George B. Bradbury, Minneapolis; M. B. Lewis, Red Wing. Alternates, Gen. George C. Smith, St. Paul; Dr. C. M. Bailey, Minneapolis: Prof. W. W. Payne, Northfield. Henry Plant and D. W. Ingersoll, delegates ex-officio.

D. W. Ingersoll, chairman of the committee on nominations, reported the following, who were unanimously elected:

President—Prof. S. S. Taylor, St. Paul.

First Vice President—Henry Plant, Minneapolis.

Second Vice President—F. A. Robertson, Winona.

The Minnesota Odd Fellows.

The meeting of the Grand Lodge and Grand Encampment of the I. O. O. F. of Minnesota was held at Owatonna, last week. In the grand encampment, Grand Patriarch Romaine Sheire presented the annual report, showing the jurisdiction to be in a flourishing condition. He has instituted three new encampments during the past year. The grand scribe presented his report, showing 757 members in this state, and with further statistics showing that the encampment branch is in very good condition.

The roll call of representatives in the grand lodge showed 100 past grands present. The grand lodge degree was conferred upon eighty new members. The grand master appointed his standing committees for the session, the reports of the grand master, grand secretary and treasurer and grand representatives were read and referred to the committee on distribution.

Grand Master Strouse congratulated the brethern upon the progress of the order for the past year. All these lodges are in a flourishing and prosperous condition. The sum of $478 was sent to the relief of brethern in Iowa rendered destitute by the cyclone of last summer. The Odd Fellows' Mutual Benefit society is in a prosperous and flourishing condition. The roll-book shows a membership of 2,000 and upward in class A. and 350 in class B, and disbursed since the last session upward of $28,000 to the families of deceased brethern.

The reports of the secretary and treasurer show a gratifying interest in membership for the year, the net gain being 703. General Hahn Upon Texas.

Attorney General Hahn has rendered the following opinion in answer to inquiries from State Auditor Braden, in which he says:

The letter of C. E. Crane, county auditor of Waseca county, referred to this office by you, has been duly considered, and in reply I would say that by Sec. 69 of tax law a penalty of 10 per cent. is to be charged upon all taxes remaining unpaid on June 1. In the statement of delinquent taxes filed with the clerk by the auditor this penalty is to be included therein. Interest, however, is not to be charged until judgment is entered and the land sold (Sec. 98). It follows, therefore, that in the case put by Mr. Crane, the owner has the right to pay the original tax with the 10 per cent. penalty and accrued cost, and that no interest can as yet be demanded or required of him. As to the other question propounded, I would say that if a piece of land is, at a tax sale, bid in by the state, and the interest thus acquired by the state is not assigned nor the land redeemed, then and in that case it is not proper to either enter another judgment against the same or to again sell the same. Section 89 expressly provides that in case the right of the state is assigned before absolute forfeiture and before redemption, the purchaser or assignee shall pay the amount for which the same shall have been bid in, with interest and the amount of all subsequent delinquent taxes, penalties, costs and interest upon the same." If redeemed the redeemer must pay "the amount of delinquent taxes, penalties, costs and interest thereon" (Sec 90). If, however, the land has been sold to a purchaser, or the right of the state at any prior sale has been assigned, then it is necessary that such lands having delinquent claims thereon be sold, the same as though no prior judgment or sale had been entered or had.

Passing Events.

The fact that only three of the 2,656 couples whom the Rev. Dr. Miner of Boston has married have been parted by divorce, leads him to think that, the state of mind which brings people to a Universalist clergyman for union is that which will enable them to live happily together."

Four hundred and thirteen Mormon immigrants landed at Castle Garden last week. Of these 217 were English, 184 Swiss and German, and 12 Scandinavian. Nearly all were comfortably clad, and parents and children as a rule looked healthy. There were no attractive women. They are probably more fortunate now than they will be when under the clutches of the Mormon church.

Dr. J. E. Pollock considers that the evidence furnished by the Brompton Hospital, London—which has had by far the most extensive experience with the disease of any institution in the world—proves that consumption is not conveyed from one person to another by contact or by breathing the same air. At least, during the thirty-six years the hospital has been in operation, the medical attendants, nurses and others employed about the establishment have been unusually free from this affection.

The white and colored people of the South form churches without attempting to bring the two races together. A clergyman tells of one experiment in uniting the white and colored members. "It went like oil for a while. After six months the old colored leader came and said to the pastor, "We tanks you awful that we'es in wid you. It's mighty kind; but now we find we can join wid you, we somehow don't want to. We'es talked de thing all ober, and we ones tink we'd rudder be by ourselbes. We has better meetings alone, shure, and gits on more."

A marked feature of rural life in England, at the present day is the substitution of permanent pasturage for tillage. Year by year the disproportion between tilled and untilled land becomes greater. In the whole of England there are upwards of 32,000,000 acres, and of these in 1870 upwards of 9,000,000 acres were laid out in permanent pasturage. In 1880 the untilled land had increased to 11,000,000 acres, and the increase is now maintained at the rate of 4,000,000 acres per year. Taking the whole of Great Britian the increase is even higher, 12,073,000 acres only being untilled in 1870, as compared with 14,821,000 in 1882, whilst in Ireland the change is still more marked. This is owing to foreign competition in the cereal crops.

From observations made in New York and neighboring cities, Dr. A. A. Julien concludes that the various stones used for buildings will retain a decent appearance in walls for the following periods: Coarse brownstone from 5 to 15 years, laminated fine brownstone from 25 to 50 years, compact fine brownheat of the sun.

The Bessemer Steel Works in Bethlehem, Penn., have made a new departure in mining operations, having bought a tract in Cuba containing a large deposit of very pure and uniform specular ore, which they propose to mine and import into this country. The mines are only fifteen miles from the port of Santiago, and as labor is cheap and the Spanish Government has withdrawn the export duty, it is estimated that the ore can be imported at little above the cost of mining in Pennsylvania. The iron-workers in Bethlehem should not fail if courage in experimenting would insure success. They have only lately established a branch of their foundry in Alabama, where the ore, fuel and cheap labor are all to be found together.

A Georgia paper tells of the expedient of a trader for furnishing whisky in a local option settlement. He bought a lot of cocoanuts, and after drawing off the milk filled them up with the coveted liquor. Soon after a minister called to buy a cocoanut. The trader was in despair, but managed to tell the gent of the cloth that the nuts were unsound. The minister seemed anxious to procure one, and told the merchant that if they had milk in them they were all right; and shaking one was convinced of their soundness. The merchant could do nothing more, and sold him one, hoping he would get out of the scrape in some way. In about half an hour after the minister left the merchant received a note saying, "Send me six more cocoanuts exactly like the one I purchased of you."

The president has appointed the following government directors of the Union Pacific: I. H. Broombley of Connecticut, George G. Haven of New York, Watson Parrish of Nebraska, Colgate Hoyt of New York and Arthur L. Conger of Ohio. Mr. Conger is the only new member of the directory, and was chosen as successor to Mr. Edward P. Ferry of Utah Territory. These five directors met with those chosen by the stockholders, but have no voice in the proceedings, as they are simply acting in the nature of agents of the government.

A. E. Johnson Esq. has been mentioned by his friends as a candidate for State Treasurer. We do not know how the gentleman feels about it but if he would accept and should be elected no better man could be found for the position. Mr. Johnson is interested in the development of the Northwest having large personal interests in this Red River Valley and we believe that he would receive a hearty support up here. Certainly there has been no better man named for the position as he is every way eminently qualified. We would hold up both hands for him.

THE POLK COUNTY TEACHERS' INSTITUTE.

Special Report for the Polk County Journal:

SECOND DAY, June 12.

Morning session opened at 9 o'clock with roll call, to which 44 numbers responded; afterwards recitation of sentiments, followed by the Lord's Prayer in unison, and singing the beautiful hymn "Over There."

The first exercise was a lecture upon Language, by Prof. Grey. He began by clearly stating the leading fact, that "there is more difficulty in teaching language than any other subject, it being the one great study taught at, and the greatest obstacle being the teacher himself." After making this statement evident to all, he continued: "What are your reasons and what do you expect to accomplish in teaching it? To secure for the patient, 1st, a good vocabulary: 2d, a correct use of words; 3d, a fluent use of words. We should not confound the terms grammar and language, if we do, soon we are working at the dry details of grammar alone, leaving out the beauties of language giving stones for bread."

The second topic—Reading—was discussed by Prof. McCleary, reminding us of three distinct rules for good reading, which every teacher will remember, because of their (dis)-similarity in understanding and feeling. Good tests of primary reading being, as all agreed, readiness in calling words, good pronunciation, expression. All of which ideas were apparently drawn from his class, but which were enlarged by himself in giving advice that was evidently needed and should be carefully considerd.

The third topic—Geography—was discussed by Prof. Grey. "Does a child know aught of this subject before attending school?" Diversity of opinion, settled in the affirmative, that he has the foundation work practically laid out and has acquired it by his own quick observation of men, animals, products, localities, &c., thereby basing all geographical knowledge upon observation, and deducing the grand fact that this study should be taught to beginners by actual eye work. Here our Professor made the broad assertion, (which would be evident to every thinking person, if they could once see the manner of very many rote school keepers,) that if the child were not well fortified in the elements of knowledge before the average teacher gets hold of him, we would, as a nation, drift into barbarism in a few generations.

A few methods were discussed and the subject left "wide open" for future thought.

Prof. McCleary then took up the topic of Practical Book Keeping, giving a brief, systematic plan of keeping strict account of all business transactions. (All the school ma'ams came forth in the afternoon armed and equipped with nice, neat little red-covered note books, thus showing how deeply his efforts were appreciated.) Adjourned for dinner.

AFTERNOON SESSION.

Usual opening remarks on punctuality, also easy manner of keeping register, and the interesting subject of Mental Science, by Prof. Grey. The basis of correctness being to understand ourselves, to know the workings of our own minds and to examine its processes, for without doing this we cannot understand the material upon which we work—child mind) and any teaching, from primary to university work must be in harmony with the laws governing the mind that learns the subject; and we cannot follow the same plan in all things, for every study determines that it shall be taught in some general way. Also the teacher must have a knowledge of child-nature in respect to the physical, the mental, and the moral being. This involves the knowledge of how to govern, to discipline, to teach, which constitutes school economy. The teacher must also know the subject, as a scholar, as a teacher, having professional knowledge, that is, be able to see the mental state of the mind in learning each subject. The vastness of the field of learning is greater than man can comprehend.

Recess, Professional Literature, Hygiene, History, closed the afternoon session. A committee of three was appointed to take charge of subscriptions for books and periodicals.

June 13th, 3d, Day.

Roll call to which 46 members responded, sentiments by volunteers, Lords Prayer, followed immediately by Supt. Carruth, who in a few brief remarks suggested that a tribute of respect be paid to the memory of the late Prof. Chas. E. Smith, Superintendent of the city schools, who has heard his last recitation and answered the roll call of the Great Master, whose death was the first to occur among the teachers of Polk County. Therefore I now appoin a committee to draft resolutions of condolence and regard respecting the same.

Exercise 1st. Prof. Grey's continued semi-lecture upon language; the mistakes in correct methods of teaching it, recommending teachers not to introduce incorrect language for the purpose of contrasting right and wrong speech, children being such keen imitators they are apt to use the undesired words, the end to be reached not to simply make grammarians but orators and speakers of pure English. In every class strict attention should be given to the cultivation of observation, reason and memory.

Exercise 2d. Reading, how to be taught by letter, word, or sentence, Prof. McCleary illustrating an interesting manner of teaching the letters or alphabetical method now so nearly obsolete. The smallest unit that means anything to a child is a word (a letter in itself, without combination, means nothing to him,) the largest unit is a sentence. Therefore the best general plan is deduced, 1st, to commence with the word method, 2d, combine words into sentences and phrases, 3d, after a number of words have been learned spell by sound and letter. Provide them with suitable seat work, and just here came out the mooted question, Print or Script. The Prof. agreeing with printers, that is, children will learn to read faster by printing.

The writers not at all convinced because the "wise men passed over to the other side" held firmly, faithfully to the best idea. That although causing more work for the teacher, children can be taught to write as easily as to print, their words, thereby accomplish far more in a certain time than the printers could dream of. The call bell for recess quieted the discussion, and Prof. Grey took up his subject of Geography, again impressing upon the mind that this study should not be taught merely as an enumeration of words and facts, but every step should be illustrated by bringing the mind into actual contact with objects by representatives of nature on small scales, so that the child catches the right idea from the thing itself and truly understands, not imagines that he sees them. It is not just to consume much time on subjects not important to the learner but it is right for them to thoroughly understand and know the geography of his own neighborhood, town, county and state. Afterwards an interest is built up that leads to wider fields or not.

AFTERNOON SESSION.

The roll was called to which fifty members responded. Next came Prof. Grey's review of Education, and continuance. The mental powers manifest themselves in different ways—seeing, hearing, &c. This activity of mind is called perception, by means of which we acquire knowledge. Three elements enter into every act of mind—intellect, sensibility and will, getting down to the solid conclusion, after illustrating widely, that definitions without good illustrations are only stumbling blocks and hindrances; all of which Prof. McCleary clinched with the striking comparison "of teaching a blind man the harmony of colors," he who cannot know the meaning of color no more than a child can know the meaning of definitions not explained and illustrated. The entire lesson became indellibly stamped upon the minds of all, because of the aptness of the comparison. Then he returned to his own topic—Primary Arithmetic—giving the class a thorough, sufficient course to pursue, until the tap of the call bell warned him to stop at 4 o'clock. Supt. Carruth called for the resolutions from the chairman of the committee, who arose and read the following;

WHEREAS, It has pleased an All wise Providence to remove from our midst by the hand of death our worthy and esteemed co-laborer, Prof. C. E. Smith.

Resolved, That we, as teachers, deeply deploring the loss to our profession, would express our appreciation of his merits as a teacher and his character a citizen, and assure his bereaved family of our sympathy in this their hour of sorrow.

Resolved, That a copy of these resolutions be presented to the family of the deceased, and that the same be published in the city papers.

Special Correspondence of the Globe.

Angus, Polk Co., Minn., (Which is in the Red River Valley) June 5th.—The Globe readers will no doubt wonder where Angus is located, that it should be honored with a special correspondence, and to satisfy this query, let the reader procure a folder or time table of the St. Paul, Minneapolis & Manitoba railway, follow its trunk lines to Fergus, Branesville, Glyndon, Crookston and twenty miles beyond, and you will see Angus indicated on the map—well, if you were on the train, just stopping a moment at Angus, and you should look out of the car window you would only see a huge 30,000 bushel elevator, a general store and a school house, only this and nothing more; but should you, like myself, stop here, and make tours out in the country to the east west north and south and behold the immense stretch of rich prairie yet scarcely touched by the plow, and still enough land under cultivation to warrant the estimate of 200,000 bushels surplus for market this fall, you would sit down and write to your friends who may be in search or want of the Red river valley lands in their virgin purity to come direct to this part of the valley, and look for themselves, and be convinced that half has not been told. After having been to the westward and eastward of the station, several miles in both directions and having been on several farms with fifty to one hundred acres in crops, and some up to 500 acres, I climbed the stairs in the new elevator to the height of seventy feet and took a "bird's eye" view of the situation. The scene was supremely grand. Crookston to the south twenty miles was plainly visible, and Fisher's Landing to the southwest in plain sight, while Warren to the north about ten miles stood out bold enough to give an outline of the more prominent buildings. The cluster of houses, large and small, with immense barns and granaries, five miles to the northwest, is the "Colony," which means the Ramsay-Furlong farm, where upwards of 200 horses and mules and 100 men are employed. A. O. Bailey, of St. Paul and assistants, have several farms in this immediate neighborhood, and I believe about 2,000 acres in crop. Dr. Andrews, of River Falls, Wis., has a large and fine farm with substantial buildings, joining the town. Far to the west you see the outlines of heavy timber, banked up like black clouds against the horizon. That marks the course of the famous

RED RIVER.

The meanderings of the Red Lake river to the south is easily followed in the windings of the timber belt, which is finally lost to sight to the eastward, while the Snake river is clearly located by the zigzag course of the woodland from east to west. This is a general but very incomplete idea of the natural panorama as seen from the elevator at Angus. The larger farms 100 to 500 acre fields, appeared like garden, patches as compared with the stretch of prairie never yet turned, and only waits the husbandman to return more than ten-fold. It is this unexpectedly large extent of excellent, and I may say unsurpassedly rich soil lying here non-producing, that I wish to call attention to. While thousands are projecting exploring tours far into new countries away from railway facilities, society and other advantages—hundred and thousands of land hunters have no doubt this spring passed this busy station on their way to look up lands, not thinking or knowing, that right here, within a couple of miles, is as rich productive lands as farmers every worked. With timber in abundance within reasonable distance in every direction.

So much for the benefit of the land hunters, and now a word to the reader who may be looking for business chances. As I said only one general store here kept by Messrs. Flint, Winchester & Co. No lumber-yard, hardware store, drug store agricultural implements, nor even a land agent and 200,000 bushels wheat in sight this fall, with a 30,000 elevator to handle it, If I was not a newspaper correspondent, and had the necessary capital, experience and ability I would make a stake here myself, but seeing I can't I am willing you should. I forgot to say there is no hotel here, and I have been staying around with farmers, like school teachers in former days, and walking is now my forte.

We will now retrace our steps down from this height in the elevator and have a chat about this country in general. So far as I can learn, and am able to judge the seeding throughout the Red River Valley, this season, although late, was finished in good shape, and the farmers are generally satisfied with the prospects for a good crop, knowing too well that the first requirements for a good harvest are favorable condition of the soil, good working weather and prime seed wheat; and this reminds me of what some farmers told me about poor seed. It appears that last fall's heavy rains drenched some stacks not put up "for keeps,' and that the wheat thus exposed to the rain was injured to some extent, so much so, that occasionally it has not sprouted in the ground, when sown this spring.

This has necessitated re-sowing in some instances, much to the expense and annoyance of the luckless farmer, but it will no doubt serve as a good lesson in the future. Of course, the area re-sowed is insignificant but as it involves a principle, I mention it.

The stock—horses and mules—are generally rather gaunt and show the effect of the continuous heavy spring work, as it is no dress-parade drill to harrow this heavy black-muck-soil. However, farmers say that a little grain and the new grasses will soon put the stock in good working condition for trotting season soon at hand. I cannot speak with any accuracy about the increase in breaking but judging from talk among the farmers, whom you see are authority for a good deal in this letter, the increase will not be quoted as large as last season, but may range from 15 to 20 per cent, possibly 25.

You ask if many "emigrants" are coming in—well no—not what I call emigrants, that is, coming direct from the old country, what we usually call salt water fellows. There are good settlers (some better than emigrants) from Michigan, Wisconsin and even New York state, and they are well-to-do folks, with stock, implements and household goods and wast no time getting a foothold and beginning operations. If you are office-worn and feel like taking a rest, come out here and tramp over these prairies, facing the invigorating winds and you will have a good appetite and sleep the sleep of the just, but it will be short nights, as it gets dark about half past ten and day break by three o'clock in the morning. Last night I read the Globe by twilight, after ten o'clock. I feel just right to continue this incoherent farm talk, but ten to one you are not a farmer and don't care, and as my train is in sight I will bid both the Globe reader and Angus "Good bye."

LOCAL NEWS.

Pete Cornelius has over 100 acres of breaking done.

T. Thibeault has located at St. Hilaire and says that he is having a big trade up there.

Don't forget the Jubilee singers on Saturday evening at Ericsson's Hall. A rich treat awaits all who attend.

A lovely rain on Sunday night and during the day Monday, was appreciated by the farmers, as the soil was much in need of it,

Charlie Davis has received a choice lot of small musical instruments. Drop in and see them and hear the music of the Swiss orchestra.

John R. McKinnon returned from a trip to his farm at Black River, on Friday, where he had been with his family, who will spend the summer there.

Nels O. Paulsrud and G. Spoklee, from the west side, were in the city on Thursday. They report grain looking splendidly, with fine prospects for a big crop.

The McKinnon Brothers, on Saturday, received the sad news of the death of their brother Angus, which event took place at Glengary Co., Ont., on Saturday morning.

The real estate boomer of St. Hilaire, Mr. J. C. Davis, smiled upon us on Friday. J. C. is happy in the belief that St. Hilaire will be the boss town of the upper country.

The notorious "Farmer Brown" passed through the city on Friday headed south. He came in from Bartlett and stated to some acquaintance that he was going to St. Paul.

Robert Houston has over 50 acres of new breaking on Section 4, and intends to stop at 120. He has had one four-ox team at work so far, but this week puts on more beef to rush things.

Mr. J. W. Zimmerman was in the city on Friday, looking into the saw mill project. He is immensely pleased with the prospects of our city and is inclined to catch on. He left for Winnipeg for a few days.

Charlie Davis' opening night was a grand success. It was announced through these columns that his ice cream parlors would be ready on Saturday evening, and promptly on that date a large number were on hand. When we say it was nice we know whereof we speak, for we were there.

M. B. Hayes came over from the Devil's Lake country to get a breath of fresh air. M. B. is getting as bronzed as a Chippewa brave. He thinks that nothing will eventuate in the Ward case and is of the opinion that the Ward boys were altogether too hasty and headstrong, thus bringing their own doom down upon themselves.

Mr. R. Daoust, the jolly mine host of the Carman Hotel, would call the attention of farmers and all interested in good horses to the fact that he has just received a fine Scotch horse from Canada, that may be seen at his stables in Carman. Farmers who desire good, stocky horses with a constitution like iron, should call round and examine Mr. Daoust's horse.

Peter Cornelius informs THE JOURNAL that he took a grist to Sohler & Kankle's mill on the Sand Hill River one day last week, and that he got 39 pounds of flour to the bushel of wheat, and that the flour is of the very best he has ever had made. He is enthusiastic in praise of that mill, and by all we can learn this mill is deserving of it, as the owners spare no pains to give satisfaction and build up a reputation.

Smedes & Vance' brickyard team took a tumble to themselves on Friday careering up Broadway and over the bridge at a 2;40 gait, and landing safely at the yard. Mr. McPherson was at work on the bridge replacing plank when they came along and fortunately had only one plank up when he saw them coming and just had time to get that down and get out of their way when they swept along like the wind. At any other time of the day they would not have escaped so easily, as several plank were up the most of the time.

Paul Bataglia, the leading furniture man is daily receiving accessions to his large stock of furniture and is daily making large sales of all sorts from a top to a parlor sett complete. When you wish anything in the line of furniture don't fail to call at Bataglia's furniture rooms on Broadway.

Charlie Hopkins, a recent arrival from Prattsburgh, Steuben Co., N. Y. was greeting his friends in this city for a few brief moments on Friday, while awaiting the train for St. Paul. He has been in the employ of the railroad company at Bartlett since he has been in this country. He thinks Crookston the finest place he has seen in the Northwest.

The project of obtaining a grader and ditcher in the town of Fairfax seems to move remarkably slow, notwithstanding the canvasser has been diligent in his efforts to secure signatures. We have heard of a case or two where men would not sign sign "because the thing would not help them personally as much as it would the town at large." Such specimens of humanity ought to be enclosed in a cockle-shell and sent to some Zoological garden as a sample of noxious weed that will grow even in this glorious North-west—sometimes. But their reasoning is utterly at fault, for there is not a foot of land in the whole town of Fairfax that would not be worth twice as much as it is to-day if a system of good roads and ditches was inaugurated in that town. And there is not a farmer, who has to haul loads of grain every spring and fall who would not be benefitted in that item alone double what his tax would cost him. Why, we are confident, that if the town should bond for $10,000 (instead of $5,000 that is asked) and the money be judiciously expended, after they had used the roads one season, they would not dispense with these roads and go back to where they are now for thrice $10,000. The time is close at hand when it will require from $1,500 to $2,000 a year to keep the roads in barely passable condition, when if the town invests in a grader and ditcher the roads can all be built for the sum asked, if judiciously expended, which it most assuredly would be. Every farmer in that town, who declines to sign that petition, is standing in his own light by putting off the day of good roads and allowing every other town to get ahead of Fairfax. The ditcher ought to be at work right now in order to do what it should this summer, and we do hope that there are enough sensible men in Fairfax to obtain the requisite number of names at once, so that the business may be soon commenced; It would make thousands of dollars difference in the crops of that town next year to have good roads and ditches put in this year.

THE POLK COUNTY TEACHERS' INSTITUIE.

Special Report for the Polk County Journal:

Wednesday Evening, June 13, '83.

The first lecture of the course was delivered at the Court Honse by Prof. T. J. Grey, of St. Cloud, Institute Conductor. The audience was large and appreciative, being unanimous in the conclusion that this lecture was by far the most interesting, the soundest educationally that Crookston ever was favored with. The amount of historical information conveyed being almost incredible for the space of time occupied all of which a child could hear and understand with pleasure. We give some of its principle points but they convey only a meager outline of the language in which the ideas were clothed. They are like the structure or skeleton of the athlete without its beautiful covering of flesh. Imagination must picture the grand physique in all its perfection.

EDUCATION IN RETROSPECT.

1st. The modes and means of educating the young constitutes one of the most important social institions of the past or present.

2d. The educational system of today has its roots in the soil of the past.

3d. It is of interest and profit therefore for all who would control and educate youth to know something of the history of this great social engine.

4th. The earliest schools of the East were those of the priests, the learning of the Egyptian priests, their monuments; Greece indebted to them.

5th. Greece secularized education, Picture of Socrates.

6th. Decline of learning in the Roman Empire. The dogmatism of the early church turned against secular or pagan study. Monkery not conducive to the growth of society, or to the development of learning. Final slow fell upon the Empire from the invasions of the Goths and Huns.

7th. The character of these tribes.

1st. Their barbarism.

2d. Their grievance and hatred of learning.

3d. They are our ancestors.

8th. Complete destruction of the Roman law, customs, education etc.

9th. Slow growth of education.

1st. Of monasteries.

2d. Of the sons of Knights etc.

3d. The school code.

10th. The revival of classical study, effect of the crusades, scholastic philosophy. All learning consisted in blind acceptance of authority. The thralldrom of human thought.

11th. The growth of the Universities of Europe. Their beneficial effects upon the state of general Intelligence.

13th. The Protestant reformation, the Jesuit schools, the school code of John Sturm, the place usurped by Latin and Greek, the lack of attention to other studies.

14th. The work of Francis Bacon, the great blow he dealt to the formalism and scholastic training. He set the mind free. His Norman organism is the emancipation proclamation of the human intellect. He gave us the new method which characterized the work of to-day. Other men have added little or much according to their ability, commenius, Locke, Rousseau, Pestalozzi and others.

15th. We stand to-day on the mountain top, we have little praise if we do no better, and know no more than our forefathers.

FOURTH DAY, JUNE 14TH.

Roll call of 53 members, usual opening program. Prof. Gray approving morning exercises in public schools, as tending to draw children's thoughts from their outside world, and to concentrate them upon their school business. If made interesting enough to accomplish this result, the day is well begun, and teacher and pupils both on the right track for pleasant work. Passing on to his language lessons proper, with the dictum, that every branch of study should be made into one, the topical method of pursuing them being the best, well exemplified by requiring the teachers to assume themselves a class of little folk and to do the work of such.

2d. Prof. McCleary-Reading,-whose faculty of teaching teachers to teach the same is unparalleled. Recess. 3d. Geography, globes, method, show that 1.—Globe represents the earth's attraction, showing how we live on its surface, their divisions of land and water, directions, taking journeys, day and night and the seasons making plain to the dullest brain why maps can not give correct ideas of distance and direction, that the fault is inherent in the map itself and not in the teacher. Explanation of the terms east and west being a revelation to some showing them how absolutely necessary the globe is to successful illustrations, also in location principal divisions, continents and islands, so that children will think of them as parts of a whole and as merely isolated localities. Book keeping closed the morning work.

AFTERNOON SESSION.

Prof. Gray. 1st. Words are the signs of ideas, then ideas, must precede words. 2d. Words do not in themselves convey ideas. Example of Chinese school, wherein children are taught to repeat, wise, antiquated sayings not at all applicable to childhood, which they can not understand. This act of memorizing being taken as acquisition of knowledge. 3d. Sight brings knowledge, use, models, pictures, lastly words, never committing to memory what has not first been perceived.

SECOND EXERCISE.

Prof. McCleary, Arithmetic, wherein some of the veterans were up and doing, or not doing, as the case might be. During the morning session Prof. McCleary made the request that there should be brought in from the highways or byways, four primary scholars, two boys and two girls. Now it is easy enough to say 'bring a boy out" the next thing is to catch him. No boys to be caught on a holiday, but there were four tiny mites of girls, bright and pretty, forthcoming, and the Prof. very soon illustrated his primary arithmetic from life itself, the little infantry corps working more satisfactorily than the veterans (nothing like models.)

Recess. After which Prof. Gray introduced President Allen, of the St. Cloud State Normal School, who addressed the teachers for a few minutes, giving a description of, and explaining some of the arrangements for comforts and convenience, study and home life to be found at St. Cloud. Also a few general, practicable, regulations for school. Adjourned. In the evening a delighted audience listened to his lecture on "Education our National Salvation."

EDUCATION OUR NATIONAL SALVATICN.

The question of the permanence and prosperity of our nation is not decided. There are evidences of decay and death; there are also evidences of growth and life. Our danger is ignorance, our salvation is education. The common idea is that education consists in securing a knowledge of the branches of a school course of study. It is more. It extends over the three-fold nature of man, his body, his intellect, and his moral and religious susceptibilities also. Education is the development and discipline of the complex nature of man. The feelings are to be disciplined, the passions are to be restrained, true and worthy motives are to inspired, a profound religious feeling is to be instilled, and pure morality inculcated under all circumstances. All this is comprised in education. Only those who are educated are fit to become voters. Citizenship in a republic like ours should be only obtained by fitness. No society or association whatever, acting in any capacity has any right to nurture ignorance. The State must see to its safety. By all the force it can command it should say to every parent, "you must educate your child," and if he will not, and stubbornly sets himself against the very best good of the country, let the child be taken from him to the extent that it shall be educated.

OUR NATION IS IN DANGER FROM ILLITERACY.

Five millions of the fifty millions of the population of the United States over ten years of age cannot read; six and a quarter millions cannot write. Of the ten millions of voters in the United States one in five cannot write his name. There are eighteen miliions of children and youth in our nation. Of this number seven and one-half millions, or five-twelfths of the whole are growing up in absolute ignorance of the English alphabet. Thirty-two and three-tenths per cent. of the voters of the south are illiterate. Of these 69.7 are colored and 30.3 are whites. In New Mexico 45 per cent. of the white population and 69 per cent. of the colored population cannot write. This is an alarming exhibit The church cannot reach this ignorance, Sabbath school instruction does not compare in thoroughness and efficiency with the public schools. One day in a week for a single hour is not enough time to be devoted to the great work of educating the youth of our nation in morals. Six days in each week, and six hours in each day is hardly sufficient. It is imperatively demanded that all lovers of this country should most thoroughly interest themselves in the great work of popular education. Eight hundred thousand came to us from foreign shores during the past year, and fully a million will be added during the present year. All of these must be educated. In addition to the burden of ignorance which we have nurtured at home we are increasing it daily from abroad. It becomes then a necessity to educate. "We must educate or we shall perish." It must be concluded that self-protection is the first law of the State as of the individual save no republic can exist without universal education it follows that the nation has a right to afford at public cost education to the people. The State must educate in all the branches of a good education, but it must add to the three R's, reading, writing and arithmetic, two other R's viz: right and wrong. It is the business of the State to prepare men to live. It is not the business of the State to prepare men to die. It is not the business of the State to teach men their duties towards God. It is the duty of the State to teach men the virtues, industry, economy, courage, benevolence, love, hope and temperance, as well as the general fundamental principles of right and wrong. This is the statute law of the State of Minnesota.

FIFTH DAY JUNE 15,

Fifty-three members present.

First came Prof. Gray's Scripture lesson on the lily. Apropos: Language lessons carried into the realms of Grammar. While the Prof. is earnestly busy, our thoughts are flying away from predicate, subject, analyzing, diagraming, and instead of taking down the conversation our pencil is running along in these words, which we afterwards gaze at in extreme astonishment, knowing that we have lost a valuable lesson. Teachers who go away from this Institute not benefitted nor aided in their work are either too dull to comprehend or too indolent too apply themselves. These instructors cannot be excelled in qualification nor courtesy. Observe the pleasant way they have of convincing a blunderer that he has not said anything outrageous, yet so gently affectionately correcting the same that the patient does not feel the hurt of the probe. While my pencil is getting so erratic, Prof. McCleary has gone off into vocal music and teaching foreigners to read and speak. I catch the words, "teach them to talk, then to read; use objects in the room," &c.

Next came Prof. Gray's Geography exercise. Maps, what and how, order of maps, (explodes lots of antiquated ideas—good!) and shows how to make maps for our schools.

Book-keeping, closing exercises.

AFTERNOON SESSION.

Prof. McCleary took up the subject of mensuration, areas, based upon parallelogram, triangle, trapezoid, &c. Children who had never studied it, understood the reasoning; let that truth speak for itself. Then followed our last lecture on "Mind Culture," and we all regretted the fact, wondering whether we might ever be so favored and fortunate again.

School economy, covering the ground efficiently of punishment, with Superintendent Carruth's vote of thanks and appreciation, to Prof's. Gray and McCleary closed the afternoon session.

The teachers assembled at the Court-house in the evening and listened to an instructive and practical lecture by Prof. McCleary. The bare outlines of which will serve to recall, perhaps, some of the focible truths aptly presented.

Superintendent Carruth requests that the citizens who so hospitably entertained the stranger teachers accept his sincere thanks.

LOCAL NEWS.

Dont miss the fun on St. John's Day, Monday, June 25th.

F. R. Stevens an D. McLennan, of Angus, were courting this week.

Warninger & Trombley keep every thing in the line of bottled beer that you ever heard of.

Bro. Osborne, of the Glyndon News, dropped in on us on Tuesday. He came up to attend the Congregational Conference.

Mr. M. P. Losey, of Euclid, is in the city on jury duty. He informs us that Jay Losey, who went west last fall, has a fine claim near Bismarck and is doing well.

Warninger & Trombley have their sample room neatly fixed up and have everything in the line of foreign an domestic goods that you can desire. Call 'round and interview 'em.

The JOURNAL is informed that a young man named John Farrell, who had a claim near Maple Lake, was drowned at or near Winnipeg last week. The full particulars we could not learn.

Dolph Peterson, on the JOURNAL farm had the misfortune to cut his foot severely on Tuesday last. Dr. Van Dyke went over and patched him up in good shape, but he will be aid up for some time.

Capt. Geo, Whitcomb of Alexandria paid the JOURNAL a pleasant visit on Thursday last. He has one of the finest tree claims in the Northwest down at Glyndon and boasts of his success in raising trees and things.

Mr. J. H. Sanders, Mr. Hayes and Mr. Hamery, of Red Lake Falls were looking over the city on Saturday last. They all swear by Red Lake Falls but cannot fail to notice the rapid improvements going on in Crookston.

J. W. Holmes and lawyer Boyle, of Red Lake Falls were in on Monday to see the city, and, of course, had to interview the JOURNAL man to be in the fashion. While they admit that they have a fine young city at Red Lake Falls they knew that Crookston is the boss.

Mr. W. H. Foote, of Euclid, appeared bright and early Monday morning to attend to duties at court. On a good and sufficient reason his honor excused him from jury duty and W. H. departed happy. He says crops at and about Euclid are looking splendidly.

John Williams, who manipulates the fancy mixtures at Charlie Seely's, is said to be on adept in the art—anything that John can't fix up it is useless for you to go harking about anywhere else after—it don't grow in this climate if he can't raise it. If you don't believe it try it.

Euclid Township, Polk Co., Minn. owns a New Era Grader which they hire run for $20 per day, covering all expenses, and handles 1,000 cubic yards per day, or upwards. The usual cost of such work is 15c per yard, which would be $150, the town thereby saving $130 per day.

Two new bridges are completed in Fairfax township. One near Wm. Marrin's and the other near Himmelsbach bros. residence. That is business. Soon with the help of their new grader Fairfax will be well supplied with good roads and ditches.

Charlie Seeley has his exchange fixed up neat and cosy—a regular picture gallery. He has a way by which he can make the leanest man short and fat, and the fattest man tall and lean by the simple kink o' the wrist applied to a mirror. Oh, you lean, cadaverous specimen of humanity go in, "laugh and grow fat."

We are told that the little girl, Emma Woork, who was accidentally shot near Maple Lake, notice of which appeared in last issue, is in a very critical condition. Her recovery is extremely doubtful. LATER—On Wednesday Mr. S. P. Norton informs us that she has taken a turn for the better and is improving.

A Circus on Tuesday night gave the police all they wanted to attend to. They corralled six or eight of the performers and dispersed the balance. During the melee a pistol was discharged in front of the Central House but no one was hurt by it as we can learn. These midnight brawls are unseemly and should be put down if the police force has to be trebled to do it. It wont do to encourage them.

The JOURNAL has just received from the furniture ware-rooms of Paul Bataglia, an elegant desk which is a model of neatness and practical utility. Mr. John Morgan, a barkeeper of long experience, has been engaged by Warninger & Trombley to do the honors in their establishment. He comes from Fergus Falls where he has been employed for the past two years and it is said that he knows better how to dish up mixed refreshments than any man in the northwest. At any rate he has had a long practice at the bar and ought to be a good lawyer.

If you have any courting to do this week drop into Dan McKinnon's restaurant and sample a good square meal such as he knows how to dish out; and if you have any courting to do this week just trot your best girl down to Dan McKinnon's restaurant of an evening for a-(n)-ice cream. You bet it would settle the case pretty directly—there might a sort of a coolness arise between you and the fair one, but—believe us it would redound to your credit— it's what they like.

Mr. I. O. Langen, of Hesper, Winnesheik Co., Iowa, has been visiting Mr. Peter Cornelius for a while. Mr. L. is one of the oldest settlers in Winnesheik Co. going there in a covered wagon from Milwukee in 1852, with nothing but pluck and muscle as capital. By dint of economy and industry he has laid up quite a large fortune and is now prepared to enjoy it. He is so delighted with this country that he talks of investing some of his surplus wealth in Polk. County.

At regular prices, 15c per yard, such a road would cost $1.25 per rod, or $400 per mile. It costs them $80 per mile or 1'5th.

The cross-walk on Broadway, opposite the Canada House, needs repairing. If the daily tear, while scratching around after locals some dark night about mid day, should happen to tumble in and extinguish itself the city would have to pay the full value—any where between five and fifty cents. We call upon our city dads to fix up that cross-walk.

The project to extend the payment for streets and sidewalks through ten years instead of three, introduced into the council by Wm. Box is a good one and should by all means be adopted unless a better one be found. The idea of trying to pay up in full for streets and side walks in three or four years was a fool notion but it made Rome howl on the reckoning day all the same. Ten payments would ease matters decidedly.

The first Teachers Institute in Polk County, which closed its labors on Friday last was a grand success in point of numbers and interest. The success of the Institute is due in a great-degree to the untiring efforts of Supt. V. D. Carruth, who labored early and late to make it what it was and he was aided in his efforts by our citizens who opened their houses to the teachers, by the instructors who were sent to conduct the Instute, and by the teachers themselves who manifested a lively degree of interest in the proceedings and last (but by no means least) by our reporter who so faithfully and well reproduced the doings for the benefit of JOURNAL readers.

The Polk County Agricultural Society met last Thursday evening and completed the arrangments for the purchase of the fair grounds, which permanently locates the grounds on the Sathre property, and awarded the contract for making the race course. Work on the track was commenced on Monday morning and in a short time Polk County will have as fine a tract of land for fair grounds as lies out of doors in America. It lies on the Red Lake Falls road, a little over one mile east of the city and Carman, is bounded on the north by the Red Lake River, contains 40 acres, and is the finest piece of ground in Polk County for the purpose. Two roads will reach it from this city.

HOUSE AND FARM.

Household Miscellany.

It is not generally known that ripe strawberries, particularly the wild varieties, are an excellent dentifrice.

Brass is quite in favor, either inlaid or in the shape of trimming or mounting, on articles of furnishing.

Dr. Josephine Walter has carried off the position of resident physician at the Mount Sinai Hospital in New-York, after a competitive examination of candidates.

A writer in the Scientific American says: "We clean our premises of the detestable vermin, rats, by making whitewash yellow with copperas and covering the stones and rafters with it. In every crevice in which a rat may go we put the crystals of the copperas, and scatter in the corner of the floor. The result was a perfect stampede of rats and mice. Since that time not a footfall of either rats or mice has been heard around the house."

Graining which has been done a long time is apt to crack and become nicked in places so that it looks shabby and old. Ordinarily a coat of good varnish is all that is necessary to bring out the grain and make the woodwork look very well and last a great deal longer. If, however, the varnish will not cover the blemishes, a small quantity of oak or walnut stain can be mixed with it. This will darken the color, still allowing the training to show through.

Vick's Monthly states that a good remedy for the insects which infest the rose is to syringe both surfaces with a solution of whale oil soap, using one pound of the soap to one gallon of water. Another remedy is kerosene mixed with an equal quantity of milk, a spoonful of the mixture being then stirred in a gallon of water for syringing. In a few hours wash off either of these applications by syringing with clear water. Caution is recommended in the use of carbolic acid on plants, as it will destroy them if used too freely. It is advised to mix a few drops in soap suds made from soft soap, and try its strength on weeds.

Pots containing flowers should be washed as often as any mould or fungus growth appears.

How to Kill Cabbage Worms.

From the Scientific American.

The ravages of the caterpillars of the cabbage butterfly caused a good deal of trouble last summer at the State Agricultural experiment station, Geneva, N. Y., particularly those of the second of August brood. In order to test the efficacy of various reputed remedies for cabbage worm, the director applied them to the special collections of worms, and noted the effects. One specimen confined for three hours in a bottle partly filled with black pepper crawled away disorderly by the powder, but apparently unharmed. The second, repeatedly immersed in a solution of saltpetre, and a third in one of boracic acid, exhibited little indication of inconvenience. Bisulphide of carbon produced instant death when applied to the worm, though its fumes were not effectual. The fumes of benzine as well as the liquid caused almost instant death, but when applied to the cabbages small whitish excrescences appeared on the leaves. Hot water applied to the cabbage destroyed a portion of the worms, causing also the leaves to turn yellow. One ounce of saltpetre and two pounds of common salt dissolved in three gallons of water formed an application which was partly efficient. The most satisfactory remedy tested, however, consisted of a mixture of half a pound each of hard soap and kerosene oil in three gallons of water. This was applied August 26; an examination the following day, showed many, if not all, the worms destroyed. The growing cabbage presents such a mass of leaves in which the caterpillars may be concealed that it is hardly possible to reach all the worms at one application. It is of importance, therefore, to repeat the the use of any remedy at frequent intervals.

Foundered Horses.

If your horse is really foundered envelop the front feet in warm poultices, and encourage the animal to lie down by giving the animal clean straw for a bed. The shoes should be removed, and keep the horse on soft ground, whether in the stable or out of it. Give him twenty drops of aconite once or twice daily in his drink. In a week or ten days the fever and tenderness will probably have subsided sufficiently to remove the poultices and permit of the animal taking a little exercise in a yard where the ground is soft or covered with grass. Keep the hoofs soft by applying ointment, or by wrapping in wet cloths occasionally. Attend to the feeding, and give no corn or corn meal, but sound oats, with good new hay or grass. The recovery will be slow at best, and the hoofs will have to grow entirely out before all lameness passes away.

How to Plant, Cultivate and Make a Hedge.

The Osage Orange is a native of Texas, but can be grown and cultivated advantageously in most parts of the United States. The ground should be thoroughly pulverized by either plowing or spading, before the seed is planted. The surest way is to spout the seed before planting, as it is very slow to germinate when put into the ground without being sprouted, sometimes taking a whole season to come up. To sprout the seed, put into a vessel and cover with warm (not hot) water. Keep the vessel in a warm place, and change the water once a day. Let the seed soak about five or six days, after which pour off the water and cover the vessel with a damp cloth. Keep in a warm room and stir the seed occasionally. In about one week more they will begin to sprout and are ready for planting. A pound of seed, if properly managed will produce 5,000 plants. The seeds should be sown in April or May, with twelve good seeds to the foot, in drills twenty inches apart. They should be kept free from weeds, as the young plants are very tender and delicate until they get from three to four inches high. They can be set out in permanent hedges the following spring, in rows, placing them six inches apart in the row, but should be cut back to within an inch of the ground before they are set out; and to make a thick hedge, it will be necessary to cut back the first three years' growth, leaving only about eight inches of the seasons' growth. This system must be pursued every season until the hedge is of the desired height and form. Under proper treatment, a good hedge that will turn all kinds of stock, can be grown from seed in from three to four years.

Bedspreads of Unbleached Muslin.

1.—I use good heavy sheeting and make up as if for a sheet, with a broad hem at both ends; then spread it on the floor, and with a stick, or platters and plates, and a good black pencil, mark a design to suit my fancy, all around, a foot from the edge and ends. Then I sew to quilting frames and use No. 10 knitting cotton, and draw through as thick on the lines as I prefer. Cut the ends an inch long; do not tie, for when washed the shrinking of the cotton cloth holds the cotton in. I have used them and had them last ten years; but I always use a washing machine, which I think saves many times its cost in that time; besides it saves much hard work.

2.—Get unbleached muslin, ten quarters wide if possible (then there'll be no seam), and cotton thread unbleached, such as is used for making home-made cloth. Take eight threads, using a large darning needle, put it in double, that is so there will be sixteen threads when you're ready to begin work; mark it any design you like, mine is marked diagonally both ways, about two inches apart; then take a short stitch both ways where the lines cross each other. Cut off about half an inch long. Then bleach as you would anything else. The threads do not need any fastening, and the cloth and thread both shrink in the bleaching. I can not tell how much yarn it will take as I used some I had. I think three hanks will be sufficient. Length of spread, two and a half yards.

Men and Women.

The real truth is that, the country over, there are not enough earnest, deserving, ambitious young men to marry the honest, sensible, well-meaning girls who are ready to do a true woman's part in building up good and happy homes. Our family training, defective as it may be in many respects, has still kept the rein on girls while it has given spur to boys, and if the grumblers are sensible they will try to devise some way to overcome this inequality, and thus bring the young man up to such a standard as shall fit him to do something else in life than to stand off and rail at the follies or the frivolities of young women.—Philadelphia Times.

Batter Pudding With Strawberry Sauce.

Stir twelve teaspoonfuls of flour into the yolks of nine eggs and beat thoroughly, adding a little salt. Stir in slowly a quart of milk, and just before putting the pudding in a bag add the whites of the nine eggs. Boil either in a greased mould or in a heavy linen or jean bag, which has been well greased and floured. Let the pudding boil slowly two hours, being careful that the water is boiling when it is put in and that the boiling does not stop for an instant till it is done. After you lift the pudding out of the boiling water, submerge the mould or bag in cold water for a second; this will insure the pudding coming out of the mould smooth and glassy. Serve at once with the following strawberry sauce: Beat to a cream half a cup of sweet butter and two cups of powdered sugar, and add a large cup of strawberries. Mash the berries thoroughly and beat them into the sauce so that they form a smooth crimson mass. The golden batter pudding looks very pretty with this crimson sauce, and is delicious. Only a few strawberries are required, and the early acid berries are fully as good for flavoring as the sweet ones.

Jewelry for the Street.

From a Fashion Letter.

There has been a great change of late years in fashion of wearing jewelry on the street, and the tendency is still to get rid of all show and parade of jewels, restricting to essentials—a watch and a collar-button. Twenty five years ago a woman who could afford it carried a small jewelry shop in rings, bracelets, pins, ear-rings, watch, long chains, charms and pendants.

The modern imitations, which are so good that an expert is required to detect them, made it possible for all women to wear jewelry, and the moment it became common it ceased to be desirable, at least with an exclusively fashionable lady, and, was voted vulgar on the street.

Long chains and chatelaine chains are equally discredited, though they have not wholly disappeared, and the favorite watch is a small one, suspended from an engraved band, compact tiny plates connected links, and attached to the belt, the watch falling into a little pocket of the dress.

Naturally there are many fluctuations, many spurts of fashion, many temporary crazes for pins bangles, some of which still survive and are likely to be superceded by others; the pig craze; the owl craze; and now the fly and grasshopper craze—but these are all fancies which are born and die with a season. The permanent tendency is towards the elimination of jewelry from street costume and the best dressed women even now allow none to be visible, except perhaps the smallest and least conspicuous of pearl or gold knobs screwed into the ears. Now that chains have been discontinued, it is found that they were disfiguring rather than ornamental; that their weight crushed lace and disarranged the front of the dress. Bangles, too, spoil the shape of a really beautiful arm, and are not admissable with the very long gloves as they spoil the contour of the lower arm and destroy the gradually diminishing effects.

Cucumbers That Keep Green.

Take three gallons of cucumbers; wash them, put in pickle for six or seven days changing the pickle once or twice during that time; scald vinegar and put in it a lump of alum as large as a butternut. Drain the pickles, pack into a jar and pour the hot water over them. Pick some grape-vine leaves and lay over them. Close the jar for a week, then pour off this vinegar, which will do for another lot; scald fresh vinegar in which some red peppers have been placed, some horse radish, mustard seed, spices and celery seed. Lay on fresh grapevine leaves and pour the vinegar on hot. Keep closed for a while until thoroughly cool. This recipe is good and given by a lady who has made pickles the same way for 40 years and never fails to have the best. They are green and firm; I may add, however, that she makes her own vinegar by saving apple parings and cores in a stone jar and keeping covered with warm water. It is clear and good. She sometimes adds a teaspoonful of white sugar.

Physical Endurance.

Impure blood, dyspepsia, weak lungs, weak kidneys, and a weak nervous system are the five great enemies of physical endurance. Purify the blood, strengthen the various organs of life by using Dr. Guysott's Yellow Dock and Sarsaparilla, a preparation of Yellow Dock, Sarsaparilla, Juniper, Iron, Buchu, Celery, Calisaya, etc. It is the queen of all blood purifiers! It strengthens every part of the body. Its use will make you healthy and strong and increase your power of endurance. It is nature's best assistant. Try it.

A Voice From the People.

THE GREATEST CURATIVE SUCCESS of the AGE

No medicine introduced to the public has ever met with the success accorded to Hop Bitters: It stands to-day the best known curative article in the world. Its marvelous renown is not due to the advertising it has received. It is famous by reason of its inherent virtues. It does all that is claimed for it. It is the most powerful, speedy and effective agent known for the building up of debilitated systems and general family medicine.

Winston, Forsythe Co., N. C., March 15, 1880.

Gents—I desire to express to you my thanks for your wonderful Hop Bitters. I was troubled with Dyspepsia for five years previous to commencing the use of your Hop Bitters some six months ago. My cure has been wonderful. I am pastor of the First Methodist church of this place, and my whole congregation can testify to the great virtue to your bitters. Very respectfully, REV. H. FEREBEE.

Rochester, N. Y., March 11, 1880.

Hop Bitters Co.—Please accept our grateful acknowledgment for the Hop Bitters you were so kind to donate, and which were such a benefit to us. We are so built up with it we feel young again.

OLD LADIES OF THE HOME OF THE FRIENDLESS.

Delevan, Wis., Sept. 24, 1880.

Gents—I have taken not quite one bottle of the Hop Bitters. I was a feeble old man of 78 when I got it. To-day I am as active and feel as well as I did at 30. I see a great many that need such a medicine. D. ROYCE.

Monroe, Mich., Sept. 25, 1875.

Sirs—I have been taking Hop Bitters for inflammation of the kidneys and bladder; it has done for me what four doctors failed to do—cured me. The effect of the Bitters seemed like magic.

W. L. CARTER.

If you have a sick friend, whose life is a burden, one bottle of Hop Bitters will restore that friend to perfect health and happiness.

Bradford, Pa., May 8, 1881.

"It has cured me of several diseases, such as nervousness, sickness at the stomach, monthly troubles, etc. I have not seen a sick day since I took Hop Bitters." MRS. FANNIE GREEN.

Evansville, Wis., June 24, 1882.

Gentlemen—No medicine has had one-half the sale here and given such universal satisfaction as your Hop Bitters have. We take pleasure in speaking for their welfare, as every one who tries them is well satisfied with their results. Several such remarkable cures have been made with them here that there are a number of earnest workers in the Hop Bitters cause. One person gained eleven pounds from taking only a few bottles.

SMITH & IDE.

Bay City, Mich., Feb. 3, 1880.

Hop Bitters Company—I think it my duty to send you a recommend for the benefit of any person wishing to know whether Hop Bitters are good or not. I know they are good for general debility and indigestion; strengthen the nervous system and make new life. I recommend my patients to use them.

DR. A. PLATT,
Treater of Chronic Diseases.

Superior, Wis., Jan., 1880.

I heard in my neighborhood that your Hop Bitters was doing such a great deal of good among the sick and afflicted with most every kind of disease, and as I had been troubled fifteen years with neuralgia and all kinds of rheumatic complaints and kidney trouble, I took one bottle according to directions. It at once did me a great deal of good, and I used four bottles more. I am an old man, but am now as well as I can wish. There are seven or eight families in our place using Hop Bitters for their family medicine, and are so well satisfied with it they will use no other. One lady here has been bedridden for years, is well and doing her work from the use of three bottles.

LEONARD WHITBECK.

What it Did for an Old Lady.

Coshocton Station, N. Y., Dec. 28, 1878.

Gents—A number of people had been using your Bitters here, and with marked effect. A lady of over seventy years had been sick for the past ten years; she had not been able to be around. Six months ago she was helpless. Her old remedies, or physicians being of no avail, I sent forty-five miles and got a bottle of Hop Bitters. It had such an effect on her that she was able to dress herself and walk about the house. After taking two bottles more she was able to take care of her own room and walk out to her neighbor's, and has improved all the time since. My wife and children also have derived great benefit from their use.

W. B. HATHAWAY, Agt. U. S. Ex. Co.

Honest Old Tim.

Gorham, N. H., July 14, 1879.

Gents—Whoever you are, I don't know; but I thank the Lord, and feel grateful to you to know that in this world of adulterated medicines there is one compound that proves and does all it advertises to do, and more. Four years ago I had a slight shock of palsy, which unnerved me to such an extent that the least excitement would make me shake like the agee. Last May I was induced to try Hop Bitters. I used one bottle, but did not see any change; another did so change my nerves that they are now as steady as they ever were. It used to take both hands to write, but now my good right hand writes this. Now, if you continue to manufacture as honest and good an article as you do, you will accumulate an honest fortune, and confer the greatest blessing on your fellow men that was ever conferred on mankind.

TIM BURCH.

Anna Maria Krider, Wife of Tobias K.

Chambersburg, July 25, 1875.

This is to let the people know that I, Anna Maria Krider, wife of Tobias Krider, am now past seventy-four years of age. My health has been very bad for many years past. I was troubled with weakness, bad cough, dyspepsia, great debility and constipation of the bowels. I was so miserable I could eat nothing. I heard of Hop Bitters and resolved to try them. I have only used three bottles, and I feel wonderful good, well and strong again. My bowels are regular, my appetite good, and cough gone. I think it my duty to let the people know how bad I was and what the medicine has done for me, so they can cure themselves with it.

My wife was troubled for years with blotches, moth patches, freckles, and pimples on her face, which nearly annoyed the life out of her. She spent many dollars on the thousand infallible (?) cures, with nothing but injurious effects. A lady friend of Syracuse, N. Y., who had had similar experience and had been cured with Hop Bitters, induced her to try it. One bottle has made her face as smooth, fair and soft as a child's and given her such health that it seems almost a miracle.

A MEMBER OF CANADIAN PARLIAMENT.

A Rich Lady's Experience.

I traveled all over Europe and other foreign countries, at a cost of thousands of dollars, in search of health, and found it not. I returned discouraged and disheartened, and was restored to real youthful health and spirits with less than two bottles of Hop Bitters. I hope others may profit by my experience, and stay at home. A LADY,
Augusta, Me.

I had been sick and miserable so long, causing my husband so much trouble and expense, no one knowing what ailed me. I was so completely disheartened and discouraged that I got a bottle of Hop Bitters and used them unknown to my family. I soon began to improve, and gained so fast that my husband and family thought it strange and unnatural; but when I told them what had helped me, they said, "Hurrah for Hop Bitters! Long may they prosper, for they have made mother well and us happy." THE MOTHER.

My mother says Hop Bitters is the only thing that will keep her from her old and severe attacks of paralysis and headache.—Ed. Oswego Sun.

LUDINGTON, Mich., Feb. 2, 1880.

I have sold Hop Bitters for four years, and there is no medicine that surpasses them for bilious attacks, kidney complaints and many diseases incident to this malarial climate. H. T. ALEXANDER.

Two Clerical Stories.

From the Buffalo Courier.

A clergyman, who had recently taken charge of a parish in a small town in Massachusetts, relates that he was called upon to attend a funeral a few days after he had assumed the performance of his duties. As he entered the house of mourning he was met by a member of the bereaved family, who said: "You are an Episcopalian, I believe." "Yes." "Well, sir, I don't know much about your practices, but I believe you like to undress and dress a good deal. Perhaps you would like to go up stairs and put on your shroud."

This reminds us of a story told by a venerable bishop in one of the New England dioceses. He was called upon one afternoon by a Baptist minister, who asked him if he had any objections to taking charge of a funeral. The Baptist brother stated that he had suddenly received bad news, had but a very short time to catch the train, and was obliged to call upon the nearest Christian clergyman. The good bishop assented at once, and started for the house of mourning. Upon arriving there the family cordially thanked him, and then suggested that a short address in eulogy of the deceased was expected, and would be most welcome. "I complied," said the bishop, "but it was very difficult, as I had not the most remote acquaintance with the contents of the box."

Mr. Charles B. Yale of Winona, son of Ex-Gov. Yale was married recently in Milwaukee to Miss Minnie Huntington of that city.

Red Fish Lake.

Nestled amid the lofty peaks of the Rocky Mountains, away up in the Sawtooth range, in Idaho, at an elevation of 8,000 feet above the sea level, lies the beautiful Lake Tahoma. Beautiful lakes are no rare thing in these mountains, but, amid them all, it would be hard to find one presenting a more perfect picture of quiet beauty than this. Idaho means "Gem of the Mountains," and, surely, Lake Tahoma deserves to be called the Gem of Idaho. It is not large, being only about three miles long and one mile wide.

Where the water of this lake is eighteen or twenty feet deep you can see the pebbles on the bottom, and the fish darting about, as plainly as though they were in a glass globe. Then the bottom of the lake breaks off suddenly and descends almost perpendicularly several hundred feet, from which point the water grows rapidly deeper toward the middle of the lake. It is said that it has been sounded to the depth of 2,700 feet, but the story is not well authenticated. It has, however, been measured, with a wire line, 1,000 feet without finding bottom, and it has been estimated by surveyors that its greatest depth may correspond with the height of the highest peak in its vicinity, which is 1,500 feet, though no accurate measurement has yet been attempted.

The water, besides being very cold, possesses some peculiarity which makes it very difficult to keep afloat in it, or, as a man expressed it: "There is no substance to the water, and a man can't swim easily." The lake is full of fish of different kinds. It is often called Red Fish Lake, on account of a brilliant red fish that swarms its waters. Their remarkable beauty charms the eye; their peculiar habits well repay a close study and observation, and when served hot for breakfast no daintier dish could be desired. They are quite large, weighing from two and a half to four pounds. Their bodies are a bright red, and the head and fins are a light brown. They look in the water like scarlet satin. The male has a decided hump on his back, and a turned up nose, while the female is perfectly straight. In the spawning season they run up the creeks that feed the lake in vast numbers, to the gravel beds in shallow water. They dart hither and thither so swiftly and in such a multitude that the water seems, at times, an almost solid mass of color. They must live on animalculæ, for no food is ever found in their stomachs, nor are their digestive organs fitted for solid food. They will not take bait of any kind, but are speared and taken like salmon, to whom I suppose they must bear some family relations. Soon after spawning the male and female both die. When the young are hatched, they soon seek the deeper waters of the lake, and there disappear, probably going to the deepest part, where they remain until nearly full grown, or about three years.—[Correspondence Salt Lake Tribune.

George H. Corliss, at whose works in Rhode Island the big centennial engine was built, is building the engines for the first cotton mills to be erected in China. The Chinese are becoming so civilized that they will soon be able to compete with the rest of the world in making silks and satins nine-tenths cotton and one-tenth shine.

Dom Pedro of Brazil, the senior sovereign of the world, by the way, in tenure of office, having now reigned more than fifty-two years, is going to visit England again, and keepers of public institutions, museums, libraries, etc., are praying that a change may have been wrought in his habits since his last visit. He used to make appointments to visit such places at, say 5 or 6 o'clock. The custodians supposed of course, that he meant that hour in the afternoon, but when the time came they found to their dismay that he meant in the morning; and he was always punctual to the minute.

A gallant youth of Paducah, Ky., took his girl on a fishing excursion to the Illinois lakes. They embarked upon an improvised raft, which soon went to pieces, and the young man tumbled into the water and swam ashore, leaving the terror-stricken girl floating around on a log. The youth went three miles to the head of the lake, got a skiff and returned to her rescue. Now the young fisherman gets the cold shoulder from that girl. She has concluded to paddle her own canoe.

"The Play May Go On."

The father of President Hill, of Harvard College, was a man of herculean frame, and famous for his strength. It is told of him that being one time at a theatre in Orange, N. J., his attention was attracted by a small Frenchman who was trying to induce a man in front of him to remove his hat. The little foreigner leaned forward and in the most deprecatory manner said several times, "Vill you please take off your hat?" The man paid no attention to the request, and Mr. Hill leaned forward and knocked off the offending hat. The man jumped up in a rage. The attention of the audience was turned from the stage, and the play ceased; but Mr. Hill was equal to the occasion, being a justice of the peace. Towering to his full height, he faced the irate man and said calmly, but loud enough to be heard by all: My name is Thomas Hill, tanner; my address is so-and-so; any time that you want satisfaction come to me." Then turning to the expectant actors he said, with his usual air of authority, "The play may go on."

That Milwaukee Dragoon.

Last summer a dashing Milwaukee lithographer named Schoeffell, who is also in command of the Milwaukee dragoons, was spending his vacation in encampment at the head of his corps. In these piping times of peace our weary warriors lay aside their triumphant penholders and their well-worn hammers, sheathe their bloody yard-sticks, and their gallant pencils, and find peace and leisure on the tented field. Like his veteran comrades, Schoeffel relieved his strained constitution and renewed his spent energies by brave and warlike flirtations. His martial "mash" was made on the Chaplain's niece. After reveille had startled him from his secret dreams, and a hasty soldier's breakfast, French rolls, coffee, lamb chops, peaches and cream, he buckled on his armor, consisting of a white linen suit, a Panama hat and tooth-pick shoes, and went forth to flirt a valiant flirt. All day he maneuvered and deployed, and even when night overtook him, he did not retire very early. This brought on a serious engagement with the enemy, who was from Boston. At last he conquered. She unconditionally laid down her spectacles so as not to see him kiss her, and be obliged to blush. She closed her Emerson's essay on the "Oversoul" for a minute, in order to hear what the bold dragoon had to say. He thrilled her with his tail of woe, and the stories of his valiant deeds—and mortgages—in Milwaukee, as she had never been thrilled since she listened a few weeks before to the famous paper on "The Thingness of the Here," at the Concord school of philosophy. She poured out her young soul in spasms of scientific ecstacy, which lasted three minutes by her Waltham watch. Then she told her uncle—the chaplain of her lover's dragoon regiment—who blessed them both, after which she calmed her perturbed spirits with Spencer's "Data of Ethics" and soon returned to her beans in Boston. When the military festivities were over and the dragoon had begun again the hard battle of life in dunning delinquents, and trying to balance his books at night, he forgot the Boston girl, and sought solace of a more ruddy and robust maiden who soothed him every evening with Milwaukee beer. He was just on the eve of marriage with the Milwaukee girl when he was suddenly reminded of the Boston maiden. It came to him in the shape of a notice of a suit for $10,000 damages in breach of promise. Evading Miss Phœbe Cozzens, the female lawyer, who had been employed to sue him, the Milwaukee dragoon went to Boston and on his own account settled with the transcendental maiden for the cost of her trosseau, amounting to $1,500. But Miss Cozzens, cheated of her prey, is now suing him for her share of what she believes she would have got had the case been tried.

No Big Boom in Sunflowers.

From the New York Evening Mail.

"No; Oscar Wilde has created no boom in the sunflower market, and as for lilies they sell just as well as ever, the silk-stocking orator having failed to drive them out of favor among the respectable people," said a Broadway florist to a reporter for the Mail and Express, who had made certain inquiries concerning Wilde's effect on the floral trade.

"But don't you ever get any large orders for sunflowers?"

"Nothing to speak of. You see they are very dear, costing as high as $1.50 each, and it looks like having the Oscar fever too bad to use them for decorative purposes. There is a lady in Fifth avenue, however, who used them at what was called a mediæval party the other evening. Things must have been intense. Oscar Wilde was not present—he was off lecturing somewhere. The guests carried lilies of the valley at $1 per bunch; the sunflowers smiled in all their beauty, and the young men wore bangs, while Kate Greenway's colors and styles were reproduced in the ladies' costumes. The sunflowers and lilies must have cost the hostess $100. The sunflower will be worth twenty-five cents in about a week," and the florist grinned.

THE COURAGE OF LIFE.

Courage to look on coming years,
Their slender hopes, their certain tears,
With a spirit still undaunted.

Courage to strive for ev'ry gain,
For Genius, even, must work again,
And struggle for what is wanted.

Courage to see illusions fade,
Thine idols fade that thou has made,
To be by their mem'ries haunted.

Courage to see thyself grow old,
Thy place usurped by the young and bold,
Their vigor before thee flaunted.

Courage to face the dark, hours
When all things seem beyond the powers
Of the faith that thou hast vaunted.
